NEW YEAR PROSPECTS.

THE opening of the New Year, besides the interest it possesses as one of the starting-points of time, comes on us accompanied by an unusual amount of incident, domestic and foreign; but none of it is very exhilirating. At home we have a part of the Empire in such a state as to require an extraordinary application of the powers of the law, narrowly escaping the necessity of suspending it. That, and the whole condition of Ireland, is not a pleasant subject for a New Year's contemplation. In England itself prospects are the reverse of cheerful; the depression of a scarcity of food, and the subsequent dearth of gold, is still upon us. The Revenue returns show a decrease compared with the previous year, which, though less in amount than might have been expected, is still a heavy item on the wrong side of the account; it will do nothing towards brightening the first days of 1848. Trade is just in the state that might be imagined from these returns, which are the best index of activity or the reverse. Enterprise is checked for a time; it waits for the return of gold, as vegetation slumbers till the sunbeams are strong enough to waken it. In every department men are disposed to do no more than what is absolutely necessary; railways are suspended, and all the interests connected with them are depressed; iron-masters are not anxious to increase their establishments—too glad, probably, if they can maintain them on their present footing. Lower down in the scale is the same, or worse. Employment fails, and large bodies of men are let loose, with few savings from the period of labour, to float them over the, it is to be hoped, temporary difficulty. In Liverpool, this disbanding, as it may be called, of whole armies of industry, has affected the peace of the locality: outrages have occured, which have required unusual precautions on the part of the police; the security of life and property has been shaken. All these things are public anxieties, with nothing whatever of a cheering or festival character about them.

As if all this was not gloomy enough, we are being alarmed every day by discussions of the probability of a foreign invasion! The letter of the Duke of Wellington, written, as nearly as possible, this time twelve months, is first made public just at the juncture when it serves to deepen the prevailing gloom. Anxious as our homes and hearths may be, it is unpleasant to hear, from so eminent an authority, that they are scarcely worth a week's purchase. "If a merry meeting is to be wished," says old Dogberry, "why, Heaven prohibit it!" Something of such an effect has the Duke's letter; the little hilarity possible under our adverse circumstances is sadly damped by visions of a French army in possession of London, pillaging the Bank (what would all tightness and pressure be to that?), with the millions of bullion leaving the country without a few quarters of corn to return, to say nothing of all the social disturbances consequent on the presence of a hostile force. And now that our neighbours are elevated by the surrender of Abd-el-Kader, what may we not expect? The only consolation is, that the great Commander's epistle proceeds on an assumption that the advantages of steam are all on one side, while we have a belief that what it has done for our foes, if so we must call them, it has done fourfold for ourselves. There seems a presumption in venturing to question the arguments of such an authority; but we cannot subscribe to the position that we are to be annihilated so easily. If they can attempt more readily to cross the Chanel, we can still more readily watch and intercept the crossing. Is England to wait till the armed host lands? Allow that, and we grant nearly all the rest; but that is just what we shall never permit to be done. Even the probability of the invasion threatened by Napoleon was much exaggerated; he wished to blind the powers of Europe as to the real destination of the "army of England," which was actually employed on a very different service; and here it suited the policy of the Government to magnify the danger, in order to get taxes and supplies. In a period of terror, it is possible to get a nation to consent with in its calmer moments it would not hear of ; and the whole object of his argument with peaceable men is a renewal of the Income Tax, an increase of the Army and Navy to the War Peace Establishment, and a large addition to the Estimates for the Home Department, for the purpose of fortifying the heights of Shooter's Hill, Norwood, and Hampstead. Nothing can be actually certain, but it is possible for them to perpetrate. Any one individual might assassinate the first person he met in the street ; there is little to prevent him ; and the victim would be pretty sure to be off his guard ; yet such assassinations are never heard of. A knot of desperate men might, possibly, pillage a jeweller's shop ; there is no "war establishment" in front of the window to resist them ; yet the shops are not pillaged : the chance of momentary success is overbalanced by the certainty of eventual punishment. And all croaking to the contrary notwithstanding, we have more than an invasion of England by any one Power of the Continent an impossibility. The arguments of terror thus are used on this side the Channel to drive us into a war expenditure, are urged for the identical object in France! Vote us millions for frigates and steamers, says the French Government ; see the power of England ; her steam marine could destroy ours at a blow ! Thus do nations compel each other to run a race of folly, wasting their resources and impoverishing themselves, by a mutual system of scarecrow articles in the journals. To show what low policy this feelering may be made to cover, we need only point out the fact, that at this moment a controversy is raging at Paris as to whether the French Government ought to observe the compact made by the Duc d'Aumale with Abd-el-Kader when he surrendered. The wish of the Government is to bring the celebrated Arab Chief to Paris for the sake of the éclat of his presence in the capital, as a prisoner ; the word of the Viceroy of Algiers is passed that he shall be sent to St. Jean d'Acre or Egypt. But against this honourable fulfilment of the terms of surrender, the part of the French press supposed to represent the Government says—"Oh ! but see what dangers we incur should Abd-el-Kader be placed anywhere within English influence." And the French public will believe that some dreadful, undefined danger would actually be incurred ; just as the English public are beginning to think that they may wake up some morning and find Marshal Bugeaud and a park of artillery on Primrose Hill. The supposition that England could make any use of the imprisoned Arab chief against the power of France, is just as absurd as the idea that France could reduce us to a tributary power at a stroke. But by skilfully directing the public mind to this point, it deepens in fervour. Sanatory Improvement and National Education may be given up for a generation to come ; we cannot carry on a war Government and a peace policy at the same time.

THE GLASGOW ATHENÆUM.

THE City Hall of Glasgow has just been the scene of a remarkable gathering—the first Soirée of the members of the Athenæum ; than which, according to the Glasgow Chronicle, a more interesting or magnificent meeting has never been witnessed in the West of Scotland.

The Athenæum, we should explain, is, like its namesake at Manchester, an establishment for the mental and social improvement of the young men of Glasgow in literary and scientific knowledge ; with the usual appurtenances of a well-supplied reading-room and library, and the occasional delivery of lectures on literary and scientific subjects. The Institution originated (not above, as has often happened elsewhere) but with the class to be benefitted—the young Glasgowegians. Acting upon a hint from Mr. Cobden, in the spring of 1846, they adopted part of the scheme of the Manchester Athenæum, in extension of the plan of the Glasgow Commercial College. The first meeting of the promoters was held in January, 1847, and, after many fiscal difficulties, which we have not space to detail, the City Hall was altered for the Athenæum, and opened by them ; and we understand that the number of subscribers is now about 1900, including upwards of 100 ladies.

To commemorate the establishment of the Institution, a grand Soirée was held in the large City Hall, on Tuesday, the 28th of December, when from 3000 to 4000 persons were present—Mr. Charles Dickens in the chair. The Hall was gaily decorated, and had a very lively and striking appearance. Immediately above the platform, and over the chairman, was elevated a splendid allegorical tableau of an immense size, representing Time drawing aside the curtain of Oblivion; and Britannia in the act of pointing out to the Genius of Fame, who was surrounded by the Guardian Goddesses of Science, Literature, and Art, the names of her illustrious sons viz, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Bacon, Milton, Newton, Wren, Davy, Watt, Telford, Flaxman, Wilkie. Over the picture, which is from the pencil of Mr. Dudgeon, of Glasgow, there was suspended a gay canopy, having in front the Royal Arms of England. Around the Hall, at appropriate intervals, were inscribed, in letters of gold, "The Glasgow Athenæum," "Literature, Science, and Art," "The sovereignty of man lies hid in knowledge," &c. On the right of the chairman we observed a shield, surrounded with evergreens, bearing the Scottish Crown, and the inscription "Athenæum I." On the left, "Alfred," and the English Crown on a similar shield. The Union Jack and the American banner were displayed at windows on each side of the chair. The names of "Burns" and "Scott" also had prominent situations. Immediately opposite the speakers, on the pillars of the new gallery, were erected pictorial shields, ornamented with evergreens, inscribed respectively with the names of our world-renowned citizens, viz. "Black," "Bell," "Anderson," "Hunter," "Reid," "Adam Smith," "Simpson," "Hutchinson," "Campbell."

The galleries, three in number, were adorned with floral wreaths, evergreens, and appropriate printed devices : a fine military band played at intervals ; and the company indicated their appreciation of the able and judicious addresses of the several speakers with an enthusiasm worthy of the cause.

By seven o'clock the vast building was nearly filled. Soon after, the different gentlemen from the committee-room, comprising the delegates, donors, extraordinary directors, and invited guests, made their appearance ; they were received with the greatest applause. A few minutes afterwards, the chairman, Charles Dickens, Esq., entered, amidst the most enthusiastic acclamations, and the cheering and waving of handkerchiefs lasted for several minutes.

The chairman was accompanied and supported on the right by the Hon. Alexander Hastie, M.P., Lord Provost of the City of Glasgow ; the Right Hon. Adam Black, Lord Provost of the City of Edinburgh ; Colonel Mure, of Caldwell, M.P., Lord Rector of the Glasgow University ; Sir John Maxwell, Bart, of Pollok ; Professor Ayton, of Edinburgh ; Sir James Campbell ; James Lumsden, Esq., of Yoker Lodge ; James Anderson, Esq. ; Arthur Anderson, Esq. ; George Combe, Esq., of Edinburgh ; Dr. Hill, Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow, &c. On the left, James Ewen, Esq., of Strathleven ; Archibald Alison, Esq., F.R.S.E., Sheriff of the county of Lanark ; William Campbell, Esq., of Tillichewan ; John Wilson, Esq., of Dundyvan ; Professor Gregory, of Edinburgh ; Ballies Stewart, Orr, Ord, Gilmour, D. Smith, G. Smith, Brown ; a number of members of the Town Council, &c. ; Joseph Cowdin, Esq., American Consul (in uniform); James B. Neilson, Esq., inventor of the hot blast ; Robert Chambers, Esq., of Edinburgh ; Walter Cram, Esq., F.R.S. ; Charles Mackay, Esq., LL.D. ; Professor William Thomson, Glasgow University ; Peter M'Kenzie, Esq. ; John Henderson, Esq., Paisley ; Michael Thomson, Esq. ; James Hedderwick, Esq. ; William Keddie, Esq. ; Walter Buchanan, Esq. ; William Drury, M.D., Esq. ; James MacClelland, Esq. ; Henry Brock, Esq. ; J. W. Sebright, Esq. ; Alfred Hall, Esq., M.D. ; W. Galbraith, Esq. ; Charles Baird, Esq. ; James Scott, Esq. ; D. C. Rait, Esq. ; Henry M'Manus, Esq., &c.

After the reading of some letters of apology from distinguished individuals who had been invited to attend, but could not do so, the chairman rose, and was received with renewed enthusiasm. When this had in some measure subsided, Mr. Dickens addressed the company in a felicitous speech of considerable length, which we regret that we have not space to insert. In conclusion, said the chairman :

"Hazlitt, in speaking of some of the graceful fancies of the writers of fiction, says :—'How long since I first became acquainted with these characters ; what old-fashioned friends they seem ; and yet I am not tired of them, like so many other friends, nor they of me.' In this case, the books will not only possess the attraction of their own friendship, but also the manifold, I had almost said the womanifold, attraction connected with their donors. (Laughter.) I can imagine some fair Glasgow widow calling up the idea of that widow whom the good Sir Roger de Coverley never could forget. (Laughter.) I can imagine Sophia Muff careering down the Gallowgate of Glasgow, although her exploits have never been recorded in 'Tom Jones ;' and I can imagine the 'History of Europe' exciting the utmost interest without either the knowledge or consent of my friend, Sheriff Alison. (Much laughter, in which the learned Sheriff joined.) I can imagine, in short, how, through all the faces and all the fictions of your library, there will be ladies adding you 'whom age shall not wither, nor custom stale their infinite variety.' (Applause.) I am surrounded by gentlemen to whom I will soon give place, being at least as curious to hear them as you yourselves undoubtedly are ; but, before I sit down, allow me to observe that it seems to me a most delightful and happy chance that this meeting should be held at this genial season of the year, when new time, as it were, is opening up before us, and when we celebrate the birth of that Divine Teacher who took himself the highest knowledge into the humblest places, and whose great system comprehended all mankind. I hail it as a most auspicious omen at this time, when the members of so many happy families are assembling together, that we should be called upon to meet here to promote a great purpose, a general good-will and general improvement. I believe that such designs are worthy of the faith we hold ; and I do believe that they are practical remembrancers of the sacred words, 'On earth peace, good-will towards men.'"

The company were then addressed by the Lord Provost, M.P., President of the Institution ; James Ewen, Esq., of Strathleven ; Adam Black, Esq., Lord Provost of Edinburgh ; Professor W. E. Ayton ; Professor W. Thomson ; George Combe, Esq. ; Sir John Maxwell ; Professor Gregory, of Edinburgh ; and several other gentlemen, whose speeches fill six of the large columns of the Glasgow Chronicle. We regret that our limits will not allow us to quote these eloquent addresses.

Mr. Sheriff Alison, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Dickens, happily observed :—"Mr. Dickens is well known to such establishments as this. He presided at the first great meeting of the Manchester Athenæum ; and it was to the genius and talent he displayed on that occasion, that, in no small degree, the success of that institution has been owing. Within a few weeks he has presided at the annual meeting of a similar institution in Yorkshire—in Leeds ; but I am quite sure that, amongst the numerous literary triumphs which the memory of that gentleman will recal, there is none to which he will hereafter look back upon with more satisfaction than the first meeting of the Glasgow Athenæum."

The chairman epigrammatically returned thanks; and the meeting broke up at half-past ten o'clock.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Government on Saturday received intelligence of the arrival of Abd-el-Kader at Toulon. The ex-Emir, so runs the despatch, hemmed in between the troops of the Emperor of Morocco and the cavalry of General Lamoricière, surrendered to Monseigneur the Duc d'Aumale, on the condition that he shall be allowed to fix his residence in Egypt.

The surrender of Abd-el-Kader, upon which the French Government calculated for great éclat, and to ensure which every effort had been made in the course of Saturday and Sunday, was, in this respect, nearly a failure. On the Bourse a rise of only 30 centimes in the Three per Cents took place. The counteracting causes were the continuance of the march by which the King had been attacked, and the unfavourable effect produced upon his feelings and his mind by his recent loss, together with hourly increasing apprehensions of the results of the approaching debates on the Address in the Chamber of Deputies.

The violation of the pledge given by the Duc d'Aumale to Abd-el-Kader, to let him retire to Egypt or Syria, began to be warmly discussed in Paris, as no doubt existed that the captive Prince would be conveyed for exhibition to Paris.

The following description of Abd-el-Kader's person is given in the Toulonnais :—"Abd-el-Kader is of middling height. The expression of his countenance is mild, and rather mystical than warlike. His complexion has not that perfect purity which distinguishes the Arab aristocracy ; his face is pitted with small marks, which look like the traces of small-pox ; and in the middle of his forehead is a small tattoo mark. His beard is very black, but not thick. His costume is so simple, that it is perhaps not quite in accordance with his dignity. The steamer Asmodée was very bad. Without being exactly sea-sick, the strange passenger was sufficiently incommoded by the bad weather to have been prevented from leaving his cabin almost the whole passage. He only appeared on deck for about half an hour, and that was the morning following that on which they left Oran."

It is said that it is intended to confine the Emir in Fort Lamalque until an answer can be received from Mehemet Ali, as to whether he will consent to receive him in Egypt, and give a guarantee to the French Government that he shall not leave that country.

M. Dumon, the Minister of Finance, presented on Monday to the Chamber of Deputies—1st, the budget of receipts and expenditures for 1849 ; 2nd, a project of law, proposing a reduction in the tax on salt, from the 1st January, 1850 ; 3rd, another, reducing the postage on letters to 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 decimes, according to the distances, also on the 1st of January, 1850 ; a fourth, relative to the supplementary and extraordinary credits for 1847 and 1848 ; and, finally, a fifth, annulling, on the great book of the public debt, a sum of 15,000,000f. in Four per Cent. Stock, in consequence of the consolidation of a similar sum belonging to the Sinking Fund.

The Deputies afterwards retired into their bureaux to elect the members of the Commission charged with drawing up the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. All the commissioners appointed were Ministerialists. The opposition to the Address will be led, not by M. Odillon Barrot, but by M. Thiers.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Directory has ordered a further reduction of the army of occupation. There are to be only 16 battalions; viz. six in the Canton of Lucerne, two in Schwyts, one in Uri, one in Zug, three in Fribourg, and three in the Valois.

A note has been received by the Vorort from the Pope, in which his Holiness deplores the intelligence which has reached him of the expulsion from Switzerland of religious bodies solemnly guaranteed by the compact of 1815, and of various acts of sacrilege committed in churches—events which have filled his eyes with tears. His Holiness makes no mention by name of the Jesuits.

SPAIN.

The Minister of Finance has presented his budget to the Chambers. The receipts are said to amount to 1,283,631,000 reals, and the budget of the expenses will be reduced to the same amount, for which purpose the Minister will demand the authorisation to make reductions which he may consider the most urgent to effect the equilibrium.

ITALY.

The state of Italy altogether presents a critical appearance. While the Diario di Roma acknowledges the arrival of 12,000 percussion muskets from France for the Civic Guard, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, according to the Patria, is about to give orders for arms in England, and, at the same time, is applying to the French Government for muskets, in the same way as the Pope. The Grand Duke is also sending extraordinary envoys to Sardinia and Parma, to Austria, on the other hand, has given such orders, that the directors of the Imperial iron foundry at Mariazelle (Austria) have publicly announced that, during the next six months, it cannot undertake any private orders, as it will be exclusively employed on works for the Government, being obliged to cast, within a given time, a great number of pieces of artillery for the fortresses and for the navy, besides several millions of projectiles, which will keep the foundry at work night and day.

The arrivals of Austrian troops in Italy still continue. Three regiments on the frontiers have received orders to march. The 18th has already left Trieste, and also several artillery waggons.

At Naples public tranquillity has not been disturbed since the 14th ult. Imposing military measures have been taken, and any attempt to create an émeute would be immediately repressed. The arrest of the Duke d'Alhaceta, and of the Duke de Martina, and especially that of the son-of the Prince de Torella, who has been deprived of his commission as an officer in the Civic Guard, have produced lively discontent in a society in which almost all the families are connected. The young prisoners, to whom all the facilities compatible with their captivity are accorded, received, on the first day of their arrest, one hundred and fifty-five visits. Since then, the visitors go in crowds to the prison of San Francesco. An order had been given by the Government to all the provincial students who followed the lecturer of the University to quit Naples before the festivity of Christmas. Those students amount to between eight thousand and ten thousand, and one of the quarters of the city would have been nearly depopulated had the order been executed. The inhabitants having remonstrated against a measure which would have deprived many of their livelihood, the order was revoked at a Cabinet Council, presided over by the King, on the 20th ; and the students, for whose good behaviour persons residing at Naples became responsible, were permitted to remain.

On the 23d ult., the evacuation of the town of Ferrara by the Austrian troops was effected. Agreeably to an arrangement concluded between the Cardinal Legate and General d'Arespere, commander of the Austrian forces, the regular delivery of the principal post (Gran Guardia) took place on that day in good order, with all the formalities required, and without any unpleasant incident, in presence of the Pontifical and Austrian superior officers, and an immense concourse of people. The posts at the four gates were likewise evacuated by the Austrians, and occupied by the Pontifical troops, with the exception of the gate of the Po, which was to remain neutral, and to be guarded only by Roman Customs officers. The Austrian troops were to retain the two barracks they had at all times possessed in the city, and to perform duty only in the citadel.

The death of the Duchess of Parma was considered likely to produce serious complications, in consequence of the recent convention signed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the ex-Duke of Lucca, relative to Pontremoli. The entry of the Austrian troops in Modena appears to have occasioned more uneasiness than excitement at Florence, although it was regarded as an indirect threat against Tuscany.

Advices from Modena, to the 29th ult., mention that the Duke had gone out to meet the Austrians, and entered the city at their head. The population, and, indeed, the Modenese troops themselves, were so indignant at the conduct of the Prince, that he was obliged to publish a justification, in which he declared that the foreign troops should evacuate the Duchy the moment his own levy is sufficient force to occupy the portion of the territory of Guastalla which reverts to him at the death of the Duchess of Parma. It appears that 150 Austrian soldiers only, with a few pieces of artillery, had entered Parma, and that they were sent for the purpose of escorting the remains of Maria Louisa, who is to be interred at Vienna.

AUSTRIA.

The Administrator of the Finance Department is about to sell the feoffs of the State, and thus efface the last remnant of its old feudal system.

The remains of the Archduchess Maria Louisa have been brought to Vienna, and placed in the Imperial vault of the Church of the Capuchins, by the side of those of her son, the Duc de Reichstadt.

HOLLAND

The official journal of December 20 publishes a Royal decree, containing the following articles :—Articles 70 and 71 of the regulation concerning the direction of the government of the colony of Surinam are suppressed, and replaced by the following disposition : Commerce and navigation in the colony of Surinam are open to all nations with which the kingdom of the Netherlands is in relations of amity. Special decrees will regulate the conditions of the admission, and the amount of duties to be taken. Our Colonial Minister is charged with the execution of this decree, a copy of which will be sent to the Council of State. —The Hague, Dec. 17, 1847. WILLIAM.—To the Minister for the Colonies, J. C. Baud." This decree is accompanied by a disposition from his Excellency the Minister of the Colonies, stating that the Royal decree shall come in force on the 1st of May, 1848 ; and that, after that date, the tariff of the export and import duties, to be introduced into the colony of Surinam, as far as concerns the ships of foreign nations, shall be based in such a manner that it shall double the dues levied on Netherlands vessels.

GREECE.

On the 14th, the Greek Government sent off a courier for Constantinople, with despatches, announcing to the Divan that it was ready to make the declaration previously required by the Porte, on the subject of the differences between the two powers, on condition that the Divan would stop the coercive measures adopted against the Greeks.

EGYPT.

On the 20th ult., Mehemet Ali was about to leave Cairo, on an excursion to Upper Egypt. Accounts and intelligence from Beyrout, of the 16th, state cholera had manifested itself at Diarbekir, Orfa, and several towns of Mesopotamia. At Bagdad the epidemic had entirely ceased.

THE BRAZILS.

Advices from Rio to the 19th of November mention that all interference had been given up by the British ; the French were still blockading, but it was expected they also would speedily raise the blockade.

Lord Howden, the British Minister, remained at Rio ; as did the Eagle, 50-gun frigate, Captain Martin, as guard-ship.

The marines and blue-jackets who formed the two parties in the river Plate, for the protection of the inhabitants and British property, had all been recalled, and had rejoined their respective ships.

The Modeste has brought on freight about 8000 dollars on merchants' account, which Messrs. Casher, freight agents and wine-merchants, of Portsmouth, have conveyed to the Bank.

WEST INDIES.

The Severn, Royal mail steam-ship, Captain Vincent, with the West India and Mexican mails, arrived on Sunday night last, in anticipation, by some days, of the time at which she was due.

Her freight consists of 699,410 dollars, the whole of which are on merchants' account, 28590 in British coin, 9400 ounces of gold dust, 12 serons of cochineal, 4 bales of silk, 326 barrels of pimento, 228 bales of tobacco, 57 cases of cigars, 23 cases of barilla, 9 packages of indigo, 20 bales of plantain fibre, and a large quantity of sundries.

The advices contain no news of interest.

UNITED STATES.

From Cincinnati we have further news of the great flood in the Ohio River, and accounts of the immense distress caused among the people by the great destruction of property.

The market is stagnant, and business in a measure suspended, on account of the great flood. The river, on the 19th ult., was within six inches of the great freshet of 1832, and rising, and seemed likely to be the greatest inundation ever experienced in the Ohio river. There were fifteen inches of snow on the ground. The mails could not arrive, as the roads were all impassable, and steam-boats were running through the public streets. The town of Lawrenceburg was overflown.

MEXICO.

Advices from Vera Cruz to the 1st ult. state that, at that time, assassinations were so common in that city, that it was dangerous to be out after dark. They were committed without ceremony, almost upon any one. A body of volunteers, to reinforce the American army, had arrived at Vera Cruz a few days previous to the departure of the Severn. They had conducted themselves extremely bad, it appears, upon the unoffending Mexicans, and had been guilty of atrocious excesses. It was ascribed by those who had frequent opportunities of knowing, that a great want of discipline existed in the American army, and the consequences were felt accordingly. Their steam navy was extremely ineffective, and it had suffered a loss in consequence of the wreck of the Senator Buchanan, a war or troop steam-vessel, off the island of Lobos. The Severn brought the crew to Tampico.

Since the Americans have gained a footing in the city of Vera Cruz, several American journals have been established, many of which had gone beyond usual license and discretion in publishing matters relating to the existing war, which matters were obtained surreptitiously from head-quarters. Governor Wilson had, therefore, issued a decree, limiting the liberty of the press to a certain extent.

INDIA.

The intelligence received by the Indian Mail, which arrived during the week, comes down to—Calcutta, Nov. 19; Madras, 20; Bombay, Dec. 1. It is no further important than as stating the limited extent to which the effect of the commercial distress in this country had been felt in India a month or six weeks ago. We shall be gratified to be able to believe that the intelligence by the next mail will be equally satisfactory.

AN institution has just been founded, under the title of "The Central Metropolitan Dispensary," to provide for the poor who are afflicted by diseases of the stomach, heart, and lungs, including consumption, asthma, &c. London has but one hospital for the reception of consumptive patients, although their case is most distressing and disastrous, the public returns of mortality testifying to the fact that more deaths are caused by this fatal disease than by any other to which humanity is exposed! The new institution has commenced operations at a temporary dispensary in Leicester-square, preparatory to a site being chosen for its permanent establishment.

JENNY LIND.—Letters from Stockholm, dated Dec. 7, mention that Mdlle. Lind has expressed a desire to appear in an original Swedish piece, and that, as there is no such thing as a Swedish opera in existence, she has accepted a part in a comedy by M. Blanche, called the "Young Lapland Girl," in which the author has introduced Swedish national ballads, a description of music in which she excels, and has gained great triumphs in foreign countries. The furore continued without abatement; but precautions were taken to prevent the disturbances which preceded her first appearance, there was such eagerness to obtain tickets of admission, that they were sold so high as 45 rix dollars, or £9 sterling; and the receipts of the evening amounted to 11,995 rix dollars, or £2219 sterling.

ART LOTTERIES.—It appears, from a statement in the Art Union Journal, that legal proceedings have been instituted to arrest the progress of Art Lotteries; writs having been issued for penalties in the form of actions for debt and costs.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The improvement in the public health during the week which closed the year 1847, after a season unusually fatal, is not equal to the expectation which the previous report of the Registrar-General tended to create. There were registered in last week 1599 deaths, showing an increase above the preceding week of 352, and an excess on the average of 563. It must be observed, however, that in the mortality from epidemic influenza, properly so called, there is a decrease of 15, the deaths from this cause being 127, whilst in the preceding week they were 142. In the last week, typhus fever caused 74 deaths; in the former week, 83. The diseases to whose [illegible] of last week is principally ascribed, are measles, [illegible] mation of the lungs and air passages. Deaths from all [illegible] pulmonary organs were 497, about 100 more than in the former week. This increase is partly accounted for by the great fall of temperature which occurred on Wednesday, the 29th ultimo.

SURREY SESSIONS.—The first general quarter sessions for the county of Surrey was held on Tuesday, at the Court-House, Newington. The calendar contained the names of fifty-nine prisoners; of whom there were—four could neither read nor write, 19; read or read and write imperfectly, 30; read or read and write well, 3; superior education, 0.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—The January Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex, for the year 1848, commenced on Tuesday morning, at the Court-House, Clerkenwell-green, before the Assistant-Judge and a full bench of magistrates. The number of prisoners for trial was seventy-nine

What is to be done with the Brighton Pavilion, is still a puzzle.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

TOTAL LOSS OF H.M. STEAMER "AVENGER."

By the Pacha, Captain Olive, which arrived at Southampton on Wednesday, intelligence arrived of the wreck of her Majesty's steam-frigate Avenger, on the Sorelle rocks, on the 20th of Dec. Three officers, a surgeon, and five of the crew only are saved.

The Pacha left Southampton on the 9th ult., with the Indian mail, in lieu of the Erin, which received damage during the late dreadful gale, and was obliged to return. She reached Gibraltar on the 17th inst., and left again on the same evening for Malta. H.M.'s steam-frigate Avenger left Gibraltar five hours before her. On the 20th, the Avenger was seen from the mast-head of the Pacha. This was at two P.M. The Pacha arrived at Malta on the 22nd, and left on the 24th for England. On the evening of the 25th she was signalled by a French man-of-war, named the Lavoisier; and Captain Olive was informed by the French captain that the Avenger was wrecked on the evening of the 20th, on some sunken rocks, known as the Sorelle rocks, about thirteen miles from the island of Galita, and which must have happened a few hours after she had been seen from the mast-head of the Pacha. The Pacha immediately accompanied the French man-of-war to the scene of the wreck, and picked up portions of it, which she has now on board. It appears that all on board the Avenger perished except three officers, the surgeon, and five of the crew, who escaped in a boat to Tunis. It was at Tunis that the French man-of-war heard of the wreck, from whence she immediately went out to render assistance, and, while attempting it, met with the Pacha.

The Avenger was a steamer of the first-class, of 1444 tons, and 650 horse-power. She was built by Sir W. Symons, at Devonport, in 1845, and was put into commission for the Mediterranean station, on the 20th of last November.

We subjoin a list of her officers:—Captain C. E. Napier (son of the Admiral); Lieutenants Hugh M. Norman, Frederick Marryat (son of Captain Marryat), Francis Rooke; Master William Archer; Second Lieutenant of Marine Artillery H. S. Baynes; Surgeon James H. Steele; Paymaster and Purser V. H. Haile, Assistant-Surgeon Bernard Delany; Second Master William Betts; Clerk Henry J. S. Walker.

LORD AUCKLAND has, in the most flattering terms, offered the naval command of the North American and West Indian stations to the Earl of Dundonald. The veteran Admiral has accepted the command, and will thus, in the evening of his days, enjoy an honour too long deferred, to which his unrivalled exploits have so justly entitled him.—Times

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.—Various statements have been published in the newspapers concerning the contemplated increase of the army. At present it consists of 103 battalions, of 1000 rank and file; but to about 20 of them an addition of two companies has been made, and they have thus been tinkered into two battalions of six companies each. Their present number, on paper, is about 107,000. It is intended to remodel the whole into 100 battalions of the line, and 25 of light infantry and rifles, each of 900 rank and file, divided into nine companies, viz. eight of service and one of depôt. This will make 112,500, or an increase of 5500 rank and file. The Guards are also to be increased to eight battalions, of 900 each, making 7200, and are to take their turn of foreign service, at least in Europe. In addition, each battalion is to have four sappers per company, who are to be properly instructed at Chatham. The artillery is to be increased to 120 companies, of 100 rank and file, and a company is to proceed with each battalion when ordered on foreign service.—Globe.

THE SLAVE-TRADE.—The Penelope steam-frigate, Captain Giffard, bearing the pendant of Commodore Sir Charles Hotham, K.C.B., Commander-in-Chief on the west coast of Africa, was to leave St. Helena on the 9th ultimo, after watering, for Ascension, having made a tour of five months to the various stations under his command. On her passage from Kabenda to St. Helena, under steam, about twelve o'clock (noon) on Sunday, the 13th of October, when about to take her floats off and make sail, the man at the mast-head reported "a sail." At four P.M. it was quite certain she was a slaver. When within range, the steamer fired a shot ahead of her; but the slaver would not heave to. The Penelope fired another shot over her; she then shortened sail, and without resistance became the prize of the steamer at a quarter to five. She proved a magnificent brig, like a Symondite, Portuguese measurement, 323 tons. The captain said he had made three successful trips in this vessel; the first time he carried 500 slaves, the second 1000, and the third trip, 500; the fourth was his present venture, which, he said, would have been his last, had he not been taken. On the third trip he said he had been chased by the Helena, as he was leaving Bahia for the coast, but escaped. He had been eighteen years engaged in this horrible traffic, and had made 25 trips, and had been taken three times. He said that if a captain of a slaver takes 1000 slaves to the Brazils, he gets 6000 dollars as his share of the cargo only; but, if taken, he, of course, gets nothing; and that the present market price of a slave at Brazil is 300 dollars.

MADAME ADELAIDE D'ORLEANS.

THE death of this Princess—the sister of his Majesty the King of the French—which we announced in our Postscript of last week, has produced, throughout the various political circles of Paris, a sensation which in this country it would be difficult to comprehend, as arising from what may appear so inadequate a cause, unless some notice, of a biographical character, of the fortunes of the illustrious deceased, in connexion with those of her Royal brother, both prior and subsequently to his elevation to the Throne of France, were offered in explanation. We therefore subjoin a few particulars of her early career.

Her Royal Highness Eugenia Adelaide Louisa, Princess d'Orleans, was born, on the 23rd of August, 1777, in the Palais Royal, the town residence of her father, Louis Philippe, Duc d'Orleans (the famous Egalité of the Revolution), and was then four years younger than her Royal brother the King of the French. Their mother was the Princess Maria Adelaide de Bourbon Penthièvre. The education of the young members of his family had been entrusted by Egalité to the celebrated MADAME DE SILLERY (DE GENLIS); and thus his present Majesty and Madame Adelaide had never been for a day separated till the year 1785, and then only for a short period, when Louis Philippe—the Duke of Chartres—assumed the command of the 14th Regiment of Dragoons, which was called after him. From the year 1785 till the fatal year 1793, the young Duke had almost daily opportunities of seeing his sister; and, even when he joined the army of Dumouries, an active correspondence was kept up between them. Thus were they both prepared for the great events which were in course of taking place, and in which, by the exhibition of calmness, courage, and judgment, they secured for themselves personal respect, if not always the consideration due to their birth and exalted rank. After the retreat and defeat of Werwinde, the young Duke of Chartres prepared to leave France. With this view, he presented himself at the Austrian head-quarters, at Mons, to obtain a passport, and thence gained the frontiers of Switzerland. At Schaffhausen he joined Mdlle. Adelaide d'Orleans, who had left Paris, accompanied by Madame de Genlis. On the 6th of May, 1793, they left Schaffhausen for Zurich, where they had intended to settle. After the retreat of the Austrian army, the magistrates of the Canton learned that the illustrious exiles bore the name of Orleans, they were prohibited from tarrying in that Canton.

From Zurich they proceeded to Zug, where they remained for some weeks, passing as an Irish family; but being soon after recognised by some French emigrants, the magistrates of Zug were [illegible] by the authorities of Berne to intimate to the illustrious exiles that they must seek another retreat.

The Duke of Chartres, now seeing that his presence, so far from protecting his sister, only served to draw down on her fresh persecutions, determined to seek out a safe asylum in which he might place her. He addressed himself, with this view, to M. de Montesquieu, who enjoyed the greatest influence with the Swiss Government, and who succeeded in obtaining a refuge for Mdlle. Adelaide in the convent of St. Clare, at Bremgarten. But her brother, the present King of the French, was meantime obliged to wander from Canton to Canton on foot; and it was at this period he obtained the situation of mathematical professor in the college of Reichenau, in the Grisons, where for eight months he taught mathematics, under the name of Chabaud Latour.

It was not, however, till his sister had obtained a safe asylum in Hungary, with her aunt, the Princess of Conti, that the Duke of Chartres embarked for America. He set sail from Hamburg, in Sept., 1796, and was rejoined by his brothers, Montpensier and Beaujolais, in February, 1797. In America the three brothers remained till the month of January, 1800, when they set sail for England, and arrived at Falmouth, where they were again rejoined by their sister. Within eight years of this latter period, the Duke de Chartres had the misfortune to lose both his brothers by consumption. The youngest, Beaujolais, died at Malta, in May, 1808; and thence the only surviving brother and sister of the house of Orleans proceeded to Palermo, where, in 1809, the Duke married the daughter of Ferdinand IV. of Sicily. Over the history of Louis Philippe from the day of his marriage, it is not our intention to travel. Suffice it to say, that though for nine-and-thirty years the Queen of the French, Marie Amelie, has been to her Sovereign and husband the most affectionate and tender of consorts, yet his sister Adelaide has ever been his guide, his counsellor—his sister and friend combined.

Retiring and unobtrusive, the Queen of the French seeks not to interfere in public affairs, and her existence would be almost unknown unless her hand and influence were traceable in some matters relating to religion, or the Roman Catholic Church in France, or to the settlement and establishment of her children. Not so, however, with the late Madame Adelaide. For more than forty years before her death she had been little separated from her Royal brother, and exerted over his mind a predominant and prevailing influence.

Women have in France ever exercised a much greater influence, both in politics and literature, than in any other country. In times not very remote, we may point to the beautiful Duchess de Longueville, the sister of the great Condé; the Duchess de Maine, the Marquise de Rambouillet, Madame de Maintenon, Madame du Deffant, Madame Roland, and Madame de Genlis; and, in our own day, we need but cite the names of Madame de Chevreuse, Madame de Balbi, Madame du Cayla, the Duchesses of Angoulême and Berri, and Madame Adelaide. Though there was nothing in the character of Madame Adelaide resembling the character of the Duchess of Angoulême, still, in the tones of the voice and the external manner, there was some resemblance; and it is certain that the sister of the King of the French exercised a far larger share of influence over her brother than his daughter-in-law and niece exerted over that graceful and agreeable, yet obstinate and bigoted Prince, Charles X.

Madame Adelaide was a woman of firm and sound judgment, and of the calmest and most reflective courage. She had seen much and travelled much, and had been a witness of the most wonderful vicissitudes. She had visited, with her brother, Switzerland, England, Sicily, Spain, Malta, Gibraltar, and various parts of Italy; and, in her earlier days, it was her habit to keep a journal, and to work, like her now Royal brother, at some trade or handicraft, by which, in case of necessity, she could obtain a living. Thus, while Louis Philippe was as expert a maker of toys and baskets as any journeyman of Nuremberg or Amsterdam, his sister was an accomplished embroiderer, and a beautiful maker of lace. When Napoleon, in 1815, landed at Cannes, the Duke of Orleans was sent, with Monsieur, by order of Louis XVIII., to stop the march of the returned Emperor. In this enterprise they failed. On his return to Paris the Duke of Orleans directed his consort and children to proceed to England; but Madame Adelaide remained with him, and followed, we believe, his footsteps to Cambrai, Douai, Valenciennes, and Lille. Nor was it till his Royal Highness bade adieu to France, in a letter to Marshal Mortier, that his sister set out with him for Twickenham, near London.

In the preliminary arrangements preparatory to the settlement of 1830 Madame Adelaide had a large share.

History has not yet disclosed a true and authentic narrative of the events in which the Duke of Orleans took some undefined part, immediately before the Revolution of 1830 was completed, in connexion with the party which placed him on the Throne. Such results are never the result of spontaneous impulse or uncontrolled accident, and posterity will probably find in the memoirs of a time still too near our own evidence which is denied to ourselves. But the conduct of Madame Adelaide at that memorable period is well known; and her decision, at a moment when Louis Philippe himself manifested an apparent irresolution, and the Duchess of Orleans a decided repugnance, may be said to have placed the Crown on the brows of her brother. On July 30, 1830, M. Thiers and M. Scheffer—men at that time of slender character and authority to convey the offer of a Crown—proceeded to Neuilly, to communicate to the Orleans family the wishes of the party then in possession of supreme power in Paris. Louis Philippe had retired to Raincy, and the emissaries of the Hôtel Lafitte were received at first by the Duchess. No sooner had M. Scheffer disclosed the object of his mission, than he was interrupted by the generous and delicate refusal of the future Queen, who disdained to wear a Crown just snatched from her nearest relatives. The scene changed when Madame Adelaide entered the room. "Make us what you will," said the bold and not unambitious Princess, "provided we are not proscribed"—for, in presence of these revolutionary scenes, the terrible recollections of 1792 were mingled with dreams of a more august future. Madame Adelaide listened with marked favour to the arguments by which M. Thiers thought fit to support his mission. She expressed her own readiness to enter Paris, seen entirely in the power of the populace, and she assented, on behalf of her brother, to the offer which placed the destines of France in his control.

In all the subsequent deliberations of Louis Philippe's reign, Madame Adelaide has enjoyed a great degree of influence. She contributed to give the Court of France that strong domestic character which has governed not only its manners but its policy. Her shrewdness and fidelity entitled her to the confidence of the King and the deference of his Ministers; and her enormous fortune (estimated, we understand, at 60,000,000 f.) has enabled her to provide for those members of the Royal Family to whom the Chamber of Deputies has hitherto refused a suitable provision.

Madame Adelaide had for many years been privately married to General Baron Athalin, a Peer of France, formerly an officer in the staff of Napoleon, and now one of the Aides-de-Camp of his Majesty the King of the French, who sent him, in 1830, on confidential missions to the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburgh. Baron Athalin is a very scientific engineer, and one of the most accomplished draughtsmen in Europe, as will appear from his labours in Charles Nodier's "Ancienne France," and in Golberry's "Antiquités d'Alsace."

During a long time past the Princess Adelaide was sinking a prey to a serious malady, which was slowly exhausting the little force which the vicissitudes, the fatigues, and the chagrin of her long career had left her. After the attack of Lecomte on the King, she said to one of her ladies of honour, "I may still live some time, but be assured that I have this day received my death-blow." A few days since, Madame Adelaide had been attacked with the reigning epidemy, which, though slight, had complicated the disease under which her Royal Highness had been suffering. Nevertheless, her position did not inspire any serious uneasiness. She rose on the 30th, complaining only of extreme weakness. She received the King and the Royal Family that afternoon. She conversed with the Duke de Montpensier as to the Christmas presents she proposed to purchase. She even expressed a hope to assist, but seated, at the presentation on New Year's-day. In the afternoon she slumbered on the sofa. Her sleep was tranquil, and showed no symptom of danger; her respiration was easy and natural. The King entered the Princess' chamber, who continued to sleep. He departed without having disturbed her. At a later hour, the physician of her Royal Highness approached her, and having carefully observed her, he began to be apprehensive of that prolonged and obstinate lethargy. Shortly afterwards, symptoms of too serious a nature gave to this peaceable sleep its real character—it was the commencement of the Princess' agony. The King rushed into the chamber in a state of distraction. The King, the Queen, and the Princesses surrounded the couch of the Princess in her agony, who received, in the midst of the tears and the prayers of her family kneeling before her, the religious assistance which opens the gates of Heaven to a Christian soul. Some minutes afterwards the Princess was no more.

The body of the Princess Adelaide, after being embalmed, was exposed in a chapelle ardente at the Tuileries, on Sunday, and her funeral took place, at Dreux, on Wednesday.

The King and the Court are to wear mourning during two months.

THE CHAPELLE ARDENTE.

The two Chambers, anxious to give the King a mark of sympathy and respect on the occasion of the death of Princess Adelaide, paid his Majesty a visit of condolence on Friday week. All the chiefs of the different fractions of the dynastic Opposition, Messrs. Thiers, Dufaure, Billaut, Remusat, and Odilon Barrot, united with their Conservative colleagues in a manifestation inspired by a sentiment of lively sympathy for the King in his affliction, and of deep regret for the memory of the departed Princess.

WILL OF MADAME ADELAIDE.

The fortune left by Madame Adelaide is a very large one, and there are a great number of versions abroad as to the manner in which she has disposed of it, but we have reason to think that the ollowing details are correct:—The whole amount of the Princess' fortune is estimated at considerably more than 100 millions of francs. By a codicil to her will, written very recently, she leaves the life rent of her whole fortune to the King her brother, but after his death it is to be divided among the younger branches of the Royal Family. The Dukes of Nemours and Montpensier, and the Prince of Joinville, are to have each nearly thirty millions; the Queen of the Belgians gets a legacy of four millions; the Duke de Chartres, 2,500,000f.; and the young Duke of Wirtemberg (the King's grandson), two millions. The Princess states in her will that she leaves nothing to the Comte de Paris, because he will succeed to the Throne, and will, therefore, require no additional fortune. Besides these legacies in the Royal Family, the Princess has left Rentes producing an annual income of 60,000f. to the Hospital of Piepus, which was founded by herself. She also leaves an annuity of 7000f. to the Comte de Chastellux, her chevalier d'honneur, and numerous smaller legacies to friends and domestics. The Duke d'Aumale gets no part of the Princess' fortune; but she has left several objects of art to him as a souvenir.

It is said that the Princess has bequeathed to the Duke de Nemours her forests of Crecy and Armainvilliers; to the Prince of Joinville, her forest of Arc, in Barrois; and to the Duke de Montpensier, her magnificent estate of Randan.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

We have this week engraved a Portrait of Madame Adelaide, from a painting by Winterhalter; it is a fine whole-length portrait, and has recently been engraved and published in Paris and London.

The Chapelle Ardente, which we have also illustrated, was fitted up in one of the salons of the late Princess, on the ground-floor of the Pavilion of Flora, at the Tuileries. The apartment was entirely hung with black—floor, walls, and ceiling; and the coffin, covered with black velvet, with silver nails and finishings, was placed beneath a black canopy, also trimmed with silver. At the foot of the coffin was a small pedestal, covered with black velvet, trimmed with silver; and over this a white napkin, upon which was set a silver vase of holy water. Upon each side of the coffin were ranged six silver candelabra, bearing wax-lights; and there were six others upon the temporary altar, flanking the crucifix. The two priests, who are represented praying, wore a white robe over a black one; and beside them is a prie-Dieu, black, trimmed with silver lace, prepared for the Queen.

The third Illustration shows the Château of Randan, in enlarging and embellishing which the late Princess expended a vast sum of money. It is charmingly situated amidst terraced gardens and grounds of picturesque beauty, commanding a very extensive view over a well wooded domain.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

DR. CROTCH.

This famous professor of harmony, who was born at Norwich, in 1775, was a musician almost from his birth. At the early age of three years he performed on the organ with wonderful power. He possessed a most acute ear, and could name any note struck on the pianoforte without seeing it. In course of time Crotch became a profound theorist, and at the age of twenty-two (just fifty years ago) he was appointed Professor of Music in the University of Oxford, which conferred the degree of Doctor upon him. In 1822 he was named Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.

THE LATE DR. CROTCH.

Dr. Crotch composed a vast deal of music for the organ and pianoforte; also several charming vocal pieces, among which was his fine ode, "Mona on Snowdon calls." Among his productions was the celebrated oratorio of "Palestine." He likewise wrote several didactic works, one of which was his "Elements of Musical Composition, and Thorough Bass." The last time this eminent Doctor performed in public was during the Royal Festival, in Westminster Abbey, in 1834, when he presided at the organ on the third day. Dr. Crotch, for some time past, resided with his son, the Rev. W. R. Crotch, who was Master of the Grammar-School. The Doctor died there accidently on the 29th ult., and leaves behind the reputation of having been one of England's greatest musicians.

LIEUT.-COLONEL BABINGTON.

LIEUT.-COLONEL JOHN BABINGTON, a distinguished officer of the Peninsular War, entered the 14th Dragoons as an early age; and from that period until March, 1814, when he was taken prisoner at a skirmish in France, he was in active and indefatigable service, and was present at most of the brilliant actions of our armies in Spain. Col. Babington recently held the office of Barrack-Master to the Regent's Park, St. John's Wood, and Portman-street Barracks. His death occurred on the 1st instant, at his residence, Gloucester-road, Regent's Park.

COLONEL PEEBLES.

COLONEL THOMAS PEEBLES, who had recently succeeded to be second in command of the Woolwich Division of Royal Marines, was an officer of high military reputation. The course of his active service extended from 1799 to 1831. Within that period he was present at many hard-fought engagements. In 1800 he commanded the Marines in the attack on Foule; and, in 1801, he was on board the Minotaur when it captured the Spanish ships La Paz and Emralda, under the batteries of Barcelona. He was twice wounded—once at a sea-fight off Ivica, and again in 1805, in the West Indies. He was appointed a full Colonel on the 7th of December, 1846.

Colonel Peebles served for several years on the Staff as Adjutant and Deputy Judge Advocate, and had the gratification of receiving a reward from the Patriotic Fund. The gallant Colonel died on the 3rd instant, at his residence in the New Royal Marine Barracks, Woolwich.

MRS. SUSANNA LEONORA WATKINS.

THIS amiable lady died at her house in Leamington, Warwickshire, on the morning of Christmas Day last, at the advanced age of 80, having been born on Dec. 21, 1767. Mrs. Watkins was the widow of the late Rev. Thos. Watkins, of Pennyre, in the county of Brecknock, A.M., F.R.S., only daughter of the late Richard Vaughan, and sister of the late John Vaughan, of Golden Grove, Carmarthenshire, Esqrs., Lord-Lieutenant and member of Parliament for that county for many years.

By her demise, the claims of the ancient barony of Emlyn are vested in Col. Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, M.P., the Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum for the county of Brecknock.

The remains of this excellent lady were on Thursday deposited in the family mausoleum at Llandevailog, Brecknockshire.

ALDERMAN LUCAS

THIS venerable and highly respectable member of the Corporation of London has been connected with the City, and the administration of its public affairs, for a very great length of time.

Matthias Prime Lucas was born in 1762, and, by dint of industry and intelligence, realised a large fortune in business. He was elected Alderman for the ward of the Tower in 1821, and in 1828 he was chosen Lord Mayor of London. Mr. Lucas resided latterly in Kent, preserving, however, his faculties and his activity until the period of his last illness. He sat frequently on the magisterial bench, and was generally present at all civic festivities and meetings of importance. Mr. Lucas died of influenza, on the 2nd inst., at his seat, Wateringbury Place, in Kent. He leaves no son, but he will probably be succeeded in his property by his grandson, Mr. Lancaster, the son of his eldest daughter, a widow.

BLOWING UP OF THE CONCRETE SHOAL IN THE THAMES, ON WEDNESDAY.

A FEW years since, the "Conservators of the Thames" made the alarming discovery that the "good old Father" would, in all probability, be choked in his bed, unless immediate steps were taken to avert such a catastrophe. It was ascertained that the depth of the river in Limehouse Reach, at low water, had decreased from the Trinity standard of 15 feet to the shallow measure of 7 feet, a draught obviously insufficient for the regular course of navigation. This change in the depth of the stream proved to be a sort of geological plethora, by which a shoal was formed of gravel, sand, and other matters, to the extent of nearly half a mile. Upon this being ascertained, the Conservators employed their ordinary dredging-machine to clear away the obstruction, which, however, proved too far indurated to yield to such means. They next resolved to use the more summary process of ejectment by gunpowder and the galvanic battery, such as had been tried elsewhere with great effect in the recovery of sunken vessels, &c.

These operations were entrusted to Captain Fisher, the principal Harbour-Master of the Port of London, who, some years previously, successfully fired much gunpowder in dispersing the timbers of the William and Mary, sunk off Tilbury Fort. The result of the firing in Limehouse Reach proved equally fortunate, as we illustrated in detail in our Journal for May 24, 1845, pp. 329-330. By a singular coincidence, upon the page opposite this report are views of the Erebus and Terror, and a portrait of Sir John Franklin, in search of whom our Government have just sent out H.M.S. Plover.

Since the date of the Limehouse Reach explosion, Captain Fisher has persevered in his removal of shoals in the Thames by the above means; he has long since worked his way up "above bridge," and, a few days ago, having found a similar obstruction off the Temple Gardens, he resolved to set about the remedy. It proved to be a shoal of "concrete," as the accumulated matter is called, and this so considerable, that, except at or about high water, there was not water enough for steamers and ordinary craft to make way up the river, without taking a considerable turn. By the way, there is something even humiliating to the pride of a Londoner in seeing these shoals left dry!

Wednesday last was the day fixed for the engineering labour. The customary notices were given to the dwellers on the Thames bank. We are told that objections were made to Captain Fisher's charge of gunpowder, as too great for the tender nerves of certain Templars, and it was reduced accordingly. The other arrangements were briefly as follow:—A lighter was moored near the spot, and in it was placed one of Smee's galvanic batteries. Two boats were then rowed over the shoal, at high water, and a canister of gunpowder was sank in the manner shown in the illustration. A rod was first put down by the men from one of the boats, and upon this was placed the canister by rings at one side, when it was gently let down by other men with ropes. The men then rowed back to the lighter, whence a wire had previously been carried to the canister of powder, which was therewith fired by the battery on board. There were two explosions, the first of which was made at about half-past one o'clock; this was with a canister of 32lb. of gunpowder. There was no report audible at a distance from the spot; but the water heaved up in a conical mass, as shown in our engraving. The surface is not disturbed far from the explosion; but the sensation experienced in a boat on the water, at a considerable distance, was that of a dead shock. The operation is simply this: the canister of powder being placed upon the shoal, when fired, the column of water acts as a fulcrum, and causes a breaking up of the shoal to the average depth of nine feet, and a surface of forty feet diameter. No boring whatever is necessary; and after the explosion the loosened concrete is cleared away by the dredging machine.

There was a second explosion on Wednesday, with a canister of 25lb. of gunpowder. It was not generally known that the operations would take place on the above day, and the weather was wet, or there would, doubtless, have been a great concourse of spectators. As it was, Father Thames was shaken from his "cozy bed" with little ceremony, and without inconvenience to any fish, which have long since left this portion of the river for a more sanatory region. The effect was not, however, so harmless a few years since, when an explosion of about 2500 lb. of gunpowder off Gravesend blew boat-loads of live fish into mid air!

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THERE is nothing proved more completely by history than the failure of all "sumptuary laws;" even when the Executive power was nearly absolute, as in the reign of Elizabeth, the attempts made to restrain luxury and extravagance of living never succeeded. Men would not have their dishes counted nor their swords measured; they thought, as we should think now, were it the fashion to wear steel, that, provided they could pay for variety of meats and length of rapier, they had a perfect right to eat one and wear the other. In short, all interference by the Government to regulate matters so much dependent on individual control, is an impossibility. But what is not practicable or desirable in society at large, may be much wanted in a small or peculiar section of it, such as an University. Cases are perpetually occurring—a glaring one has occurred in the past week—showing the ruinous effects of the long, and what is worse, too ready credit given by the tradesmen of University towns. Society in these places is exceptional, and exists under peculiar conditions; and, if the College authorities are powerless, it may be a fair question whether the Legislature might not alter the laws of debtor and creditor within the jurisdictions of the University charters, so as at least to check the facilities by which young men are first tempted to extravagance, and then, as in the old fables, destroyed by their tempters. As far as rules and regulations are worth anything, the Universities seem the places of all others where a youth would be sure to find a "godly, righteous, and sober life" surrounding him. Those who know anything of "College," and life as it exists there, know how much the reality may be the reverse. It is possible, certainly, for a young man to unite the toil of a student to the self-denial of the hermit, even at Oxford. But he would assuredly be voted a "slow coach;" the great defect is that the prevailing tone of opinion does not give the steadily inclined sufficient support; not enough to balance the influence of the "fast men."

It is by the miserable apeing of the follies of the rich and dissipated spendthrift, that the young man of poor, or but moderate means and prospects, is destroyed. The social misery spread over the middle ranks of English society, that has sprung from the reckless career of "College" years, is scarcely to be estimated. There are learned and pious men in the ruling places; the Fellows and Tutors are said to be vigilant; the Proctors are even more than watchful; there is a regular discipline as to times and hours; there is a daily and compulsory attendance at chapel. Yet behind and under all this exist extravagance and waste almost incredible to men in ordinary life, which often send a graduate from his Alma Mater as completely ruined as if he had escaped from the den of an ogress or a usurer.

We imagine the greater part of the evil springs from the tone of English society itself, operating more fatally among a mass of young men forming a public opinion of its own, than it does in the world, where, if men waste their wealth, they at least know the difficulty of earning it—a thing which the alumni of these centres of erudition have yet to learn. There the almost slavish worship of wealth and rank—which in everyday life leads to an apeing of the style of both by those who possess neither, miserable and contemptible enough—becomes a fatal competition. We laugh at the volatile French, rate the Germans as dreamers and mystics, and plume ourselves on being the most practical and commonsense nation of Europe. Yet the middle and wealthy classes in both those countries far surpass us in savoir vivre the talent of living in ease and comfort, on a footing of equality with those of higher rank or greater wealth than the crown. The son of a crowned head in a German University associates with his fellow-students without expecting them to waste the income of a year in the riot of a night, for his amusement; nor do they dream of an impossible competition with him. In England, the son of a curate will spend as much on a "wine party" as the heir to thousands a year; and so throughout; the end, of course, being a life of embarrassment, or, in some rare case, the exposure of an action at law or the Insolvent Court. The "practical common-sense" middle class of England has, in fact, not yet learned how to associate with rank and wealth without ruining themselves by imitation—nay, they will often, when wealthy themselves, ruin each other by competition! It is not at College alone that real poverty may be found squandering borrowed means, with assumed carelessness. A convulsive effort to be rich, or, if not, a still more violent struggle to seem so, makes much of the life of England feverish and unhealthy. It may begin at College, but it by no means ends there.

THE REVENUE.

The Revenue returns for the year ending Wednesday, January 5, which have been just published, exhibit a decrease upon the national income, as compared with that of the preceding year, amounting to £2,217,790; and, deducting the China money received last year, viz. £507,644, as a casual resource, now closed, the actual decrease will stand at £1,610,154.

The great falling off appears chiefly in the Customs and in the Excise, viz. £295,567 in the former, and £790,904 in the latter.

We put in direct contrast the heads of ordinary revenue for the last two years, that it may be perceived at a glance to what items the loss is to be referred:—

|---|---|---|
| Customs ... ... | £18,310,865 ... | £18,015,298 |
| Excise ... ... | 12,521,250 ... | 11,730,746 |
| Stamps ... ... | 6,231,414 ... | 6,955,546 |
| Taxes ... ... | 4,272,408 ... | 4,331,561 |
| Property-tax ... | 4,395,591 ... | 5,450,801 |
| Post-office ... ... | 816,000 ... | 864,000 |
| Crown Lands ... | 120,000 ... | 77,000 |
| Miscellaneous ... | 317,090 ... | 184,926 |

The Customs and Excise thus show the loss above indicated; the Stamps, Taxes, Property-tax, and Post-office, each a small gain. The heads of Crown Lands and Miscellaneous, under which a certain deficit is found, are, perhaps, less deserving of consideration. The really important point is that under the titles "Customs" and "Excise;" and were it not for this last item, the balance-sheet would present a better appearance than we had a right to expect after the accumulated calamities of the past year. In the last quarter, from this source, there has only been received £3,246,883, against £3,608,155 in the corresponding quarter of the preceding year.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SOUTH SEA HOUSE.—On Wednesday, a quarterly general court of the proprietors of South Sea Stock was held at the Company's House, in Threadneedle-street, for the purpose of declaring a dividend; Charles Franks, Esq., the Sub-Governor, in the chair. Mr. Gibson, the Secretary, read the accounts. The income was £156,538 12s. 9d.; the outgoings amounted to £31,815 10s. 7d.; leaving a balance of £84,723 2s. 2d.; out of which balance the chairman proposed a dividend of 1½ per cent. on the capital stock of the South Sea Company. The motion was put and carried, and the Court adjourned.

TOWER WARD.—On Wednesday the Lord Mayor gave directions to issue a precept for the election of an alderman for the Ward of the Tower, in the room of Matthias Prime Lucas, Esq., deceased. The election will take place at Baker's-hall, Harp-lane, on Monday next. The only candidate who has appeared is Mr. Finnis, who has been for some years deputy of the ward, and upon whom a deputation, most numerous and respectable, of the inhabitants, has waited with a requisition, to which a favourable answer has, we understand, been returned.

LANGBOURNE WARD.—In consequence of the return of the alderman, Sir J. Key, Bart., from the Continent, and the intention he expressed at the recent wardmote of residing in the ward after the 25th of March next, the meeting of electors, which was to have taken place on Wednesday night at the Ship Tavern, Lime-street, in pursuance of an adjournment from that day fortnight, was not held. The explanation of the worthy alderman appears to have entirely reconciled all who had begun to be dissatisfied, and the matter may consequently be considered at rest.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—Mr. Arnott has been elected into the Court of Examiners in the room of the late Mr. Liston.

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS.—On Wednesday, the half-yearly examination of candidates for the distinctions in connexion with the institution commenced at the Collegiate Schools of St. Peter, Eaton-square. A large number of gentlemen presented themselves for examination, the subjects being classics, mathematics, the elements of commerce, natural philosophy, modern languages, &c. The Rev. J. Hind, M.A., was appointed senior moderator; and Mr. Eccleston, B.A., of Trinity College, Dublin, head-master of the Sutton Coldfield grammar-school, junior moderator. The classical examiners for the present session are the Rev. R. Wilson, D.D., of St. John's College, Cambridge; the Rev. R. G. Latham, M.D.; and Mr. Eccleston, B.A. Examiners in Mathematics: the Rev. J. Hind, M.A.; Mr. Sylvester, M.A.; and Mr. Boole. In the elements of Commerce, Mr. Payne (Leatherhead), Mr. Seggins (Sudbury), and Mr. Lane (Plymouth). Examiners in the other branches have also been appointed. The examination on Wednesday was chiefly confined to Bible history, and the theory and practice of education. A list of the successful candidates will be announced.

MARYLEBONE VESTRY.—The magistrates having increased the parish rental 2½ per cent., for the purpose of assessing the county rate, a meeting of the joint vestries of St. James and St. Marylebone was recently held, at which resolutions were adopted condemnatory of any increase in the police rate, and a memorial to the Home Secretary, praying him to prevent such an increase by a legislative enactment, was also adopted. In the answer from Sir George Grey to the memorial, which was read at the vestry meeting on Saturday last, it was stated that the right hon. Baronet proposes to introduce a bill to authorise the Commissioners of Police to reduce the police rate one penny in the pound in their warrants issued to the parishes of the county of Middlesex, provided the present assessment is not reduced; and Sir George Grey trusted that an assessment may be made to give the parishes the full benefit of this reduction, if sanctioned by Parliament for the ensuing year. The reply was entered on the minutes.

THE WESTMINSTER MURDER.—Instructions have been received from the Sheriffs, by Mr. Cope, the Governor of Newgate, intimating that the extreme penalty of the law, in the case of M'Coy and Sale, who were found guilty of the murder of Mr. Bellchambers, at the last session of the Central Criminal Court, was to be carried into effect on Monday next, the 10th inst.

FIRES IN LONDON DURING 1847.—From the official returns kept by the fire brigades of the fires that occur in the metropolis and its suburbs during the year, we learn that no fewer than 989 have taken place during the past year. The losses, however, were not so serious as in the previous year, 1846, when the number was 1022. Between 4,0 and 5,0 houses appear to have been either consumed or seriously damaged, with a loss of property estimated at about £150,000. Those in the province, according to the fire offices' returns, are far greater in extent than have been known for several years.

PROCLAMATION OF OUTLAWRY.—The following persons were on Tuesday formally proclaimed under process of outlawry:—Charles Henry Burgess, late of Hampstead, Crow Read, of No. 1, St. Alban's-place, Regent-street; the Hon. Henry Stanley, late of No. 36, York-terrace, Regent's-park; the Rev. William Cuthbert (clerk), late of No. 16, Abbey-road, St. John's-wood; Eric Baker, late of No. 29, Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square; and Henry Arundell, late of Dover-street, Piccadilly.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Saturday last—New Year's-day—after dinner, the Queen had an evening party. The company arrived at the Castle soon after nine o'clock. Among the parties who had the honour of being present were—the Marquis and Marchioness of Dowsahire, Lord Marcus Hill, Hon. Henry and Mrs. Astley, Hon. Miss Lyttelton, Miss C. Paget Carew, Sir G. and Lady Couper, Miss and Mr. Couper, the Dean of Windsor and Lady Charlotte Neville Grenville, and the Misses Neville Grenville (two); the Provost of Eton and the Hon. Mrs. Hodgson; the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Hawtrey. Her Majesty and Prince Albert gratified their noble visitors with the choral ode of Sophocles, and the harmonies of Mendelssohn, by the performance of an abridgement of the dialogue of the "Antigone," which was most expressively and effectively read by Mr. Bartley, aided by Mr. Bartholomew, the author of the English version, who assisted him as the speaker for a large chorus of the best selected professional and amateur vocalists. Her Majesty's private band, conducted by Mr. Anderson, and increased by the chief performers of the Philharmonic orchestra, completed the admirable ensemble. The beautiful ode to love, as originally written by Mendelssohn, was, for the first time in this country, charmingly rendered by Messrs. George, Peck, Beale, and Smithson. At the conclusion of the performance, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert expressed their approbation to Mr. Bartley, and were graciously pleased to pay a similar compliment to Mr. Bartholomew. The performance of the "Antigone" was preceded by a monody to the memory of the departed Melodrama, expressly written for the occasion, and printed by command of the Queen, for the company assembled, to whom it was recited by its author, Mr. Bartholomew, who in it alluded to the principal compositions of this great lyrist. Her Majesty, the Prince, and the Royal Family avail themselves of the fine weather to take open air exercise daily.

On Sunday, the Queen and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service, in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent also attended the service, attended by her Lady in Waiting.

On Monday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting during the morning, accompanied by his Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, and attended by the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis of Ormonde, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Colonel Seymour. His Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein and the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn took their departure from the Castle in the course of the day.

On Tuesday Prince Albert hunted in the forenoon. His Royal Highness was attended by General Wemyss, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Colonel Seymour. Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Prince George and the Princess Mary, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, and attended by the Lady in Waiting to the Duchess and the Gentleman in Waiting to the Duke, arrived at the Castle this afternoon, on a visit to the Queen.

WEDNESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting during the morning, accompanied by his Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, and attended by the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis of Ormonde, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Colonel Seymour. His Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein and the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn took their departure from the Castle in the course of the day.

On Tuesday Prince Albert hunted in the forenoon. His Royal Highness was attended by General Wemyss, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Colonel Seymour. Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Prince George and the Princess Mary, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, and attended by the Lady in Waiting to the Duchess and the Gentleman in Waiting to the Duke, arrived at the Castle this afternoon, on a visit to the Queen.

WEDNESDAY.—His Royal Highness the Prince Consort rode out on horseback this morning, on a shooting excursion, to the covers in the vicinity of Cranbourne Lodge. The Duke of Cambridge, Prince George, and the Prince of Hesse accompanied his Royal Highness in a close carriage. Colonel Seymour was in attendance upon the Royal party. The weather cleared up before they reached the ground. Pheasants and hares were plentiful; and, after two hours' excellent sport, the Royal party returned to the Castle between two and three o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princess Mary, between twelve and one o'clock, left the Castle in a carriage and four, with outriders, and drove into the Great Park, taking, in the course of their drive, the site of the cottage once the favourite residence of George IV., the conservatory and shrubberies attached to it, the schools founded by her present Majesty, and the fishing temple at Virginia Water. After which their Royal Highnesses returned to the Castle to luncheon with her Majesty. Her Majesty did not ride out to-day; but took walking exercise in the Home Park and in the Slopes, in which beautiful promenade considerable improvements have been made since the return of the Court from Osborne. The Royal dinner party at the Castle included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Prince George and the Princess Mary, his Serene Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl and Countess Delawarr, the Earl of Auckland, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Cambridge, the Baroness de Speth, the Right Hon. William S. and Lady Caroline Lascelles, and Mr. Edmund Miltanay.

THURSDAY.—Monday next is the period now fixed upon for the departure of the Court from the Castle to Claremont. The Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princess Mary and Prince Frederick of Hesse, walked across the Park in the morning, and paid a visit to the Duchess of Kent. Their Royal Highnesses then proceeded to Kew. The Duke of Cambridge and Prince George left the Castle in the morning for town. Her Majesty gave a grand banquet in the evening (covers being laid for 22), to celebrate Twelfth-day.

LITERATURE.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF WILTSHIRE. By JOHN AUBREY, F.R.S. Edited and elucidated by Notes, by JOHN BRITTON, F.S.A. Nichols and Son.

Whoever looks back to records of a science-observation, through the mist of two centuries, may calculate upon much entertainment, not unmixed with matter of a higher class. Aubrey's "Natural History," written between 1656 and 1691, is of this category: its MSS. are preserved at Oxford, and in the archives of the Royal Society; and the author being one of the worthies of Wiltshire, the Topographical Society, formed for the illustration of that county, have printed the volume before us, in handsome library style, to correspond with the Memoir of Aubrey, published about two years since. Both works are edited by Mr. Britton, also a native of Wilts; and his notes, corrective and illustrative, are germane to the matter, suggestive, and judicious.

Aubrey's is, indeed, a collection of the curiosities of meteorology, hydrology, geology, and mineralogy, zoology and botany, as these sciences existed in the time of John Ray. This portion of the work abounds in prodigies, rarities, and wonderments, matters we smile at in these high-fed times; but, in most instances, they are characteristic of the age, and the early records of our most erudite Institutions are not free from such misinformation. Mixed up with the error, however, there is much in Aubrey's collection to illustrate strange misgivings in the public mind as to natural causes and effects, which the better philosophy of our day has scarcely cleared off. Then, of minute observation, what a bundle is here! To show how such things accumulate, we quote this passage, in which Aubrey notes:—"Mersennus, or Kircher, says, that any one may know what quantity of liquor is in the vessel by the sound of it, knowing before the empty note. I have severall times heard great brasse pannes ring by the barking of a hound; and also by the loud voice of a strong man." Upon this, John Evelyn notes:—"The vesce, if very strong and sharp, will crack a drinking-glass;" and, nearly two centuries later, John Britton adds:—"I have been favoured with a confirmation of this note of Evelyn, from the personal experience of my old friend, Mr. Brayley, who was present at a party on Ludgate-hill, London, many years ago, when Mr. Broadhurst, the famed public vocalist, by singing a high note, caused a wine-glass on the table to break, the bowl being separated from the stem." This is as pretty a piece of natural magic as Brewster could wish to find recorded.

The Second Part concludes the worthies of Wiltshire, and the grandeur of the Herberts, Earls of Pembroke; and notes the learned men that had pensions granted to them by this noble house. In this chapter, by the way, is corrected the error of attributing the famous epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke to Ben Jonson; whereas it was written by William Browne, as Aubrey and Evelyn, and one of the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum, attest. The Countess, we are told, was a patron of "a great chemist," who, after a long search for the philosopher's stone, died at Wilton, and left in his laboratory two or three baskets of "egge shelles, which," says Aubrey, "I remember Geber saith is a principal ingredient of that stone." Gibson, the dwarf (famed by Waller), and Massinger and his widow, were likewise pensioned by the Pembrokes, but the poet's biographers have all been ignorant of the latter fact.

The records of "Arts, liberal and mechanicall," are brief, but curious. Aubrey tells us that the bottle ale of Salisbury is the best of the nation, by reason of the "nitrous water;" that white-browne paper was first made in England in King James the First's time; and that as Bemerton, near Salisbury, was the second paper-mill in England.

Under Architecture, our historian describes a Wiltshire gentleman's house in his time, as "a good high strong wall, a gate-house, a great hall and parlour; and within the little green court where you come in stood on one side the barne: they then thought not the noise of the threshel ill musique." Sometimes, credulous as Aubrey has been called, he is corrective; e.g. :—

The old tradition is, that Salisbury Cathedral was built upon woollpacks: doubtless, there is something in it which is now forgott. I shall endeavour to retrieve and unriddle it by comparison. There is a tower at Rouen in Normandie, called the Butter Tower; for, when it was built, a dispensation was layd upon all the butter that was brought to Rouen, for and towards the building of this tower; as now there is a (dnty) layd upon every chaldron of coales, towards the building of Saint Paul's Church, London: so, hereafter, they may say that the church was built upon Newcastle coales. In like manner, it might be that heretofore, when Salisbury Cathedral was building—which was long before wooll was manufactured in England (the merchants of the staple sent it then in woolt-packs beyond the seas, to Flanders, &c.)—that an imposition might be putt on the Wiltshire woolt-packs, towards the carrying on this magnificent structure. There is a saying, also, that London-bridge was built upon woolt-packs, upon the same account.

The "Church Notes" are interesting. In one of them, Aubrey relates how a fanatical Recorder of Salisbury, about 1631, broke some of the painted glass windows of the Cathedral; and, in clambering up the pews to do so, fell down and broke his leg. "For this action he was brought into the Starr Chamber, and had a great fine layd upon him (£500, J. B.), which, I think, did undoe him." In the next page, the diarist regrets that the fashion of using enamelled tiles is not revived. "They are handsomer, and far more wholesome than marble paving in our cold climate, and much cheaper. They have been disused ever since King Edward the Sixth's time." Upon this Mr. Britton notes:—"Aubrey would have rejoiced to witness the success which has attended the revived use of ornamented paving tiles within the last few years. Messrs. Copeland and Garrett, and Mr. Minton, of Stoke-upon-Trent, as well as the Messrs. Chamberlain, of Worcester, are engaged in making large numbers of these tiles, which are now extensively employed by church architects. Those individuals have produced tiles equal in excellence and beauty to the ancient specimens." The Reformation proved a sweeping blow to church ornament, and the practice of decorative art generally. Before that event, Aubrey believes "there was no country or great town in England but had glasse-painters."

The husbandry of Wiltshire was "after the fashion" in Aubrey's time.

In Malting and Brewing, however, the men of Wilts have long excelled. Famstead, the first Astronomer Royal of Great Britain, wrote a History of Maulting. "It may be objected (notes Aubrey) how came that great astronomer, Mr. John Flamsteed, to know so much of the mystery of maultsters. Why, his father is a maultster at Derby, and he himself was a maultster, and did drive a trade in it till he was about twenty years of age, at what time Sir Jonas Moore invented him and London."

The remaining chapters relate chiefly to sports, pastimes, and costumes. Some of the entries are curious enough: how King James I. was entertained at Cotesfield, by Mr. Ferraby, "with bucoliques of his own making, which were sung by his parishioners, who wore frockes and whippes like carers; and how the King was entertained with a foot-ball match; how the parish, in those dayes, would have challenged all England for musique, foot-ball, and ringing." For this entertainment (adds Aubrey) his Majesty made Mr. Ferraby one of his chaplains.

Among the "Fatalities" and "Accidents," we read how the favourite dog of the first William Earl of Pembroke starved himself after his master's death; how Dr. Bathurst, Dean of Wells, who was no superstitious man, in Aubrey's estimation, professed to him that the curing of the King's evil by the touch of the King doth puzzle his philosophie; for, whether they were of the House of York or Lancaster, it did. "'Tis true, indeed, there are prayers read at the touching, but neither the King minds them nor the chaplains." A witchcraft trial is mentioned, in 1653, at which the spectators made such a noise that the Judge (Chief Baron Wilde) could not hear the prisoner, nor the prisoner the Judge; but the words were handed from one to another, and sometimes not truly reported: the prisoner, Ann Bodenham, was executed at Salisbury, as a witch. Here is a genuine Aubreyism:—"At Salisbury a phantome appeared to Dr. Tubervill's sister severall times, and it discovered to her a writing or deed of settlement that was hid behind the wainscot."

We must now leave this very entertaining reprint, for which the lovers of the serious will have to thank the Wiltshire Topographical Society, and Mr. Britton, who has laboured so wisely and so well in his editorial vocation, for the fame of his fellow-countryman and antiquary. Aubrey was considered one of the best naturalists of his time, though he falls far short of his contemporary, John Ray, who may be regarded as the founder of true principles of classification in the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Aubrey was rather the London of other days. In the quarto before us there are found many trivial records of matters of little importance in themselves, but useful as the germs of better things, which, like wheat found in the tombs of the Pharaohs, springs, after its sleep of ages, into vigorous vegetation. In short, what with the multiplicity and minuteness of Aubrey's "History," and its pleasant gossip, it possesses high individual interest, as the picture of the mind of one of the early Fellows of the Royal Society, who, when reduced to indigence, "enjoyed a happy delitescency" in following up the bent of his genius in labouring to inform that world in which he knew not how to live.

THE ART OF BLAZON. By the Rev. W. SLOANE-EVANS. Part I. Longman and Co.

This is a laudable attempt to compress within narrow limits the essential matter of the folios of Gwillim, Holme, Leigh, Ferne, Edmonson, and other first-rate authorities upon the science of Heraldry. The present portion is occupied by the "Accidents of Blazon," preceded by an Introduction, in which the reverend author thus rejoiceth in the healthy state of Heraldry, after its escape from a sea of troubles:—

The Heralds' College is a society incorporated by King Richard III., and consisting of thirteen members, viz.:—Three Kings at Arms—Garter, Clarenceiux, and Norroy; six Heralds—Windsor, Chester, Lancaster, York, Richmond, and Somerset; and four Pursuivants—Blue-Mantle, Rouge-Croix, Rouge-Dragon, and Portcullis. The Clarenceiux and Norroy Kings are provincial; the jurisdiction of the former comprehending all England to the south of the river Trent; that of the latter, to the north. The name of Clarenceiux is taken from the Duke of Clarence, third son of King Edward III. These thirteen officers are in the patronage and under the authority of the Duke of Norfolk, Hereditary Earl Marshal. In Scotland, the Lord Lyon King of Arms presides over the College of Arms; in Ireland, the Ulster King. Laws [illegible] the bearing of coat armour were enacted, and an Earl Marshal Court established to enforce compliance and punishment. Visitations were made by the Heralds in the years 1530, 1619, and 1686, who went their circuits throughout the kingdom, for the purpose of making materials for the compilation of pedigrees, and preserving records of all occurrences of a genealogical and heraldic nature. Visitations have ceased; the Earl Marshal's Court is no longer held; and [illegible] than all, the spirit of Chivalry has been long declining. That high and ennobling feeling, which was the characteristic of our ancestors, has gradually fallen from its high estate. It is the same with Architecture, Poetry, Music, Sculpture, Painting, and even Religion—all have suffered. If we look into history, we find the cause of this. Anarchy and confusion have reigned triumphant. England has been in an unhealthy state. The cry has been, Democracy! Down with the Throne! Down with the Nobles! Level all distinctions! Let Equality be the ruse de guerre! Could it be supposed that men, who were solely bent upon the murder of their King would devote much time to the study of the fine arts and sciences? Or, could it be supposed that men who were [illegible] the noblest edifices of our land—the Cathedrals—as stables, would pay attention and reverence to the preserved ceremonies and ordinances of the Church? But [illegible] the nineteenth century the blue sky appears [illegible] developing itself; and Religion, Music, Painting, and Architecture will once more be deemed sufficiently important to occupy and engage the attention. In the cause of Heraldry, moreover, champions are springing up, who seem anxious to rescue it from its impending fate."

A PANTOMIME AUDIENCE.—BOXES, PIT, AND GALLERY.

BY ANGUS B REACH

THE Clown has just picked the pocket of a policeman—or unhappy Pantaloon has just sat down upon a hot stove—or Harlequin has just been fired out of a mortar, and left his glittering limbs stuck all over the front of that canvass house; and one mighty roar of united laughter from Boxes, Pit, and Gallery greets the event: laughter as unanimous and as hearty as though the laughers saw the wonderful exploit for the first time, and as though the very quintessence of drollery were to be squeezed out of accidents and offences.

For our own part, we have long been of the way of thinking, that a Pantomime Audience is, in its way, every bit as well worth seeing as a Pantomime itself; and we shall, therefore, during the progress of the next half-dozen tricks—which we have an intuitive instinct that we know by heart—just take the liberty of turning our back upon the stage, and sweeping our lorgnette round the house—that high-piled palace of glittering lights and mirthful faces. And what a rustle of delight thrills round that brilliant sweep of Boxes! The children are all in front. See their little round, fat, shiny faces, almost blue with mirth, garesaburg, as it were, like crimson velvet ledge. And papa and mamma are stationed in a more dignified state of enjoyment in the rear. Of course they have come there only for the dear children's sake—they always make it a rule to let them see the pantomime. It's very ridiculous, but this is Christmas time, and they suppose they must be all fools—old ones and young ones—once a year. Come, come, sir and madame, do you think that we are to be taken in by such shallow pretensions? Mr. John Dawkin—for you observe we know you—solemn man as you are in the counting-house, in Mincing-lane—influential man as you are in the vestry—aye, churchwarden as you are in the parish of St. Koweld Without—you, sir, at this moment, are within an ace of being as much delighted as is Master Charley Dawkin, just arrived for the holidays from Switchem-House, Hammersmith for you have, sir, coaxed out an uncontrollable guffaw, as you beheld that most felonious-minded of clowns steal a poker, and then thoughtlessly and culpably insinuate the red-hot end into his venerable friend Pantaloon's capacious pockets. Come, come, there are many Dawkins in the Boxes, and many Charleys. And the old boys—ay, and the old girls too—are just as happy as the young ones.

Near us, in the Pit, sit many benchfuls of sturdy playgoers. By the way, a man must be really a playgoer when you find him in the Pit. We have not such reliance on the Box population. They are a fleeting, transitory race—given to lounging in lobbies—sauntering in for a particular scene—chatting laughingly during the performance—and instituting close lorgnette inspections into the beauties of their fair neighbours. Now, the Pittite is a man of another sort. He comes to see the play, and suckles for that change for his three shillings—he stands half an hour at the door before it is opened—he is squeezed relentlessly round sharp corners, and is then rewarded with a scamper through the long whitewashed passage; and it may be a hard seat, without a back to it. Nevertheless, there he sits, and sits it out.

The Pit audience are critical on Pantomimes. They don't take favourable views of them. Our friend Mr. Humdrum, whom we observe not far off, remembers every pantomime since "Mother Goose." He is one of the "There are no actors now-a-days, sir," school. But still he goes to his accustomed place in the Pit as regularly as to his pew upon Sundays. The well-fed couple next him are cozy tradespeople from a thriving suburb. They seldom repair to a play-house; but they would count it—good pay, to—a declension of duty to miss the clown's broad grin at Christmas, or the glories of the Easter spectacle. The Pit is a great place, too, for steady-going maids, under the stanch escort of steady-going butlers. People from the country, too, get there almost instinctively; and semi-serious families from Clapton or Hackney—if such folks are ever guilty of such follies—may occasionally be detected there, huddling together, and suspicious of each other—but only on such occasions as that of a moral and respectable Pantomime, preceded by "Jane Shore" or "George Barnwell."

A glance at the Gallery—at that chaos of struggling arms and legs, and grimy grinning features—and ginger-beer bottles, which do not hold ginger-beer, but something stronger—and half-smashed straw bonnets fastened to the brass mandoline—and shirt-sleeves and hatchecked oranges—and thick sandwiches—and perspiring public-house boys, struggling through dense rows of humanity with tin pails, and keeping up a monotonous howl of "potaw, gents—potaw—potaw, gents—potaw."

Mighty was the clamour ere the broad gay act-drop rose.—"Now, then, Bill—muscek—where's your pardner—potaw, gents,—potaw—hoorah—ah, ah—hiss-s-s—throw him hover—now, then—vere are you a-shovin' to, stoopid?—Lor', Jim, if that ain't Mary Ann—mus-eek—Hot Codlins—potaw, gents—hooray!—what's the row?—you do that again—pitch into him—go it, Bill,—that's your sort—mus-eek—hoaroar—potaw—ah—shame [illegible] then—si-lence—ordayr—hats off—ah—ah—down in front—ah—sh-s-s-s," and up goes the curtain.

What an infinity of Christmas-hokes have been cheerfully exchanged upon the crowded stone staircase to-night for brass and tin coinage—ere that Gallery came to be so crowded. Little boys were certainly besieging the entrance since five o'clock, by keeping up a fire of vigorous kicks at the broad battered door; young ladies in limp bonnets and dingy shawls were to be seen, escorted by their respective "young men;" gentlemen connected with the coal-heaving interest, and their wives, puny little women—coalheavers' wives always are so—mustered in great force. The throng was further augmented by an army of those shabby nondescripts whose true pursuit and calling is a profound mystery; and, as may be conceived, terrific was the rush up that stone staircase; and invers were the unfortunate Sarahs and Sukeys over whose prostrate forms half the crowd mounted to the regions of the gods. What transpired further, our readers will partially know—the pencil will partially tell them; for it is beyond the power of the pen to enumerate in sequence due the exploits of the Gallery; how many pots of porter were consumed—how many oranges were chucked into the Pit—how many fights were begun—how many altercations were begun and ended—how many hats were knocked in—how many shawls were torn—or how many times "Hot Codlins" and "Tippitywichett" were called for. The sayings and doings of the gods, now as in ancient times, must not be too closely inquired into.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER,

AUTHOR OF "ROYSTON GOWER," "GIDEON GILES," "HISTORY OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS," &c.

CHAPTER I.—LONDON THOROUGHFARES.

T WHAT remote period of time the spot on which London now stands was first peopled by the early Cymry, can never be known. A few rude huts peering through the forest trees, with grassy openings that went sloping downwards to the edge of the Thames, where the ancient Briton embarked in his rude coracle, or boat made of wicker and covered with the hides of oxen—a pile of rugged stones on the summit of the hill which marked the cromlech, or Druidical altar, and probably stood on the spot now occupied by St. Paul's, and which nearly two thousand years ago was removed to make room for the Roman temple dedicated to Victory, —was, from all we know of other ancient British towns, the appearance of London soon after the period when the old Cymry first landed in England, and called it the "Country of Sea-Cliffs."

We next see it, through the dim twilight of time, occupied by the Romans. Triumphal arches, and pillared temples, and obelisks look down upon the streets of the Roman city. Then comes Boadicea, thundering at the head of her revengeful Britons in her war-chariot: we hear the tramp of horses and the dealing of heavy blows; see the tesselated pavement stained with blood; behold pale faces upturned in the grim repose of death;—then many a night of darkness again settles down upon the streets of the old city.

Erkenwin, the Saxon, next comes with his boasted descent from Woden, the terrible God of Battle, conquers the remnant of the ancient Britons, tramples upon their standard of the red dragon, and plants the banner of the white horse upon the rude fortifications of their capital. After many convulsions, we see the kingdoms of the Octarchy overturned by Egbert, the first King of all the Saxons; and in some old hall, with its low stunted pillars and heavy vaulted roof (centuries ago levelled to the earth), we behold him seated gravely with his Witenagemot, or assembly of wise men, deliberating upon the best means of repelling the incursions of the Danes. Under the reign of Ethulwulf the city is plundered by the stormy Sea-Kings and their fearless followers. We see then the army of Alfred hovering between the outskirts of the city and the foot of Highgate hills, and protecting the old Londoners while they gather in their harvest; for Hastings, with his ivory horn swung to his baldric, was then encamped with his Danish army beside the river Lea; and Alfred had thrown himself like a shield between the city and its enemies. We behold Ethelbred the Unready escape into Normandy; and Sweyn, King of Denmark, enter the low-browed archway which leads into the capital. The old grey wall which stretched beside the Thames, where wharves and warehouses now stand, is defended by Edmund Ironside and his followers against Canute the Dane, and ships bearing the banner of the black raven are moving below the rude bridge, which at that early period stretched over into Southwark. Harold, the last King of the Saxons, next crosses that old bridge, in the sunset of an autumnal evening, on his way to the fatal field of Hastings; and when we again look upon those ancient streets, they are filled with Norman soldiers, and echoing to the bray of Norman trumpets; for William the Conqueror is passing through the city to take possession of the Tower. From that day the History of London is familiar to all, for neither doubt nor darkness again rest upon its busy thoroughfares. Step by step might we descend through ten thousand familiar incidents, which have taken place on the very ground we daily pass over, and bring them in picturesque array before the eyes of our readers, ere we arrived at the London of our own time. But this is not our object, so much as to show the contrast between the Present and the Past, and more especially the living London in which we now move—the city of palaces and poor-houses, where peer and pauper live and die, and are each in their turn buried and forgotten.

Many of the London cries which once resounded through our crowded thoroughfares, and which the old inhabitants still remember, are no longer heard, though we occasionally pick up a few stray notes in the suburbs, that come falling upon the ear like the faint echoes of other days. The cry of "green boughs" to deck the summer parlours, and "green rushes" to strew upon the floors, has long since ceased. The fire-place is no more adorned with bunches of the blossoming hawthorn, branches of sweetbriar, and huge pots filled with the fragrant and trailing honeysuckle: art, with its paper ornaments, has driven away these beautiful products of nature, and the less healthy carpet has carried off the meadow-like smell of the rushes. "Cherry ripe" we occasionally hear, sung out as clear and silvery as when Herrick composed his inimitable little song. "Water-cresses," though no longer borne by a nymph, who paused every now and then to throw aside the long hair which fell over her nut-brown and weather-stained cheeks, is a cry we still hear; but the figure that conjured up Sabrina and the "glassy cool translucent wave" has long since departed. Lemons and oranges are cried by the wandering race, whose dark-haired mothers, in ancient days, poured forth their songs in the land of Israel. The primroses and violets of spring are still sold in our streets, but the cry of "Come buy my pretty bow-pots" is now rarely heard. The apple-stall, with its roasted chestnuts, the oyster-stall (a simple trestle), and the pieman who is ever ready to try his luck at pitch-and-toss, still haunt the corners of a few of our obscure streets, as they did in bygone days. The grinder and the tinker, and those who yet follow many a primitive old calling, and who set up their workshops in every open street where they can find a job, have been driven, with their quaint cries, into the suburbs, and the men themselves are but shadows of the jolly tinkers and merry pedlars who figure in our ancient ballad lore. The rattle, and rail, and thunder of our modern vehicles have drowned their old-fashioned cries.

Such sights and sounds were in keeping with the London in which our forefathers lived. The narrow streets, with their high houses and overhanging gables, that rose tier above tier, made with their huge projecting signs, even at noon-day, a dim dreamy kind of twilight; while the cry of "What do you lack?" drawled forth by either master or apprentice, as they paced to and fro before their open-fronted and booth-like shops, gave a drowsy kind of murmuring to the close ancient neighbourhood of the old city.

How different from the London of the present day—from the splendid streets and shops which stretch from Temple Bar to Whitechapel, and westward from those ancient City-gates, to a land of theatres, squares, and palace-like buildings. For every two or three strides we take from Temple Bar eastward, nearly a hundred a year rent is paid: half-a-dozen houses produce yearly nearly double the income of most of the foreign nobles, and many an old lady and gentleman live retired in the quiet suburbs, on the rent derived from a single house which stands in these costly thoroughfares. Nearly every floor is a separate department of commerce. Up every flight of stairs which you climb there are attendants in waiting to receive you. Temptation follows temptation—each door but opens upon richer scenes; each room is hung with costlier articles; and you stand bewildered, as if entangled amid the mazes of those splendid palaces which figure in the dreams of Oriental romance. Silks from almost every land in the sunny south, shawls woven in the rainbow looms of India, are mingled with the products of flowery Cashmere, and blended with the gaudy plumage of birds of paradise, and vases emblazoned with the dazzling dyes of China, that glitter amid piles of purple and green, and crimson velvets, hemmed with silver and gold, and hangings which might have swept their costly fringes upon the cedar floors of Haroun al Raschid.

Let the uninitiated be careful how they stand, whilst loitering and looking in through those costly plate-glass windows upon such gorgeous productions, for, upward and downward, all day long, the rapid current of human life is ever rolling in living eddies, from east to west, and jostling, in its mighty strength, every idle object it meets with on its way; and, in this ever-moving ocean, each human wave has its allotted mission, each tiny ripple "its destined end and aim."

To the quays, stations, halls, houses of business, and courts of justice, which abound in this mighty city, are thousands by unforeseen circumstances yearly driven; and those who have never seen each other since the days of their youth, are sometimes jostled together unexpectedly in this great human tide. The old citizen is suddenly summoned from his suburban retreat, where he had resolved quietly to spend the remainder of his days, and never again to "smell the smoke of London," for his house has been broken into; the property is discovered; the thief is in custody; and the old man once more elbows his way through the crowds of London, in wonderment at the many changes which have taken place since he first retired from business. Another hears that he has not been fairly dealt with, and has come many a long mile that he may with his own eyes examine the will which is deposited in the Court of Doctors' Commons. The invalid loiters with feeble step, halting every now and then to peep in at the attractive windows, before he embarks in the vessel which lies in waiting to carry him to a more congenial climate. You see the ruddy-faced, top-booted countryman, who is either attending a committee, or summoned as a witness upon a trial, waiting patiently to cross the street, and marvelling in his own mind what strange procession it can be that is made up of such a long train of all varieties of vehicles? You can at a glance detect the man of business from the man of pleasure, by the hurried and earnest manner of the one, and the idle and easy gait of the other. The down-looking thief is dragged along by the policeman, almost unheeded, except by the lazy rabble of boys who follow their heels, and the poor woman on whose features crime and anguish have placed their stamp, and who exchanges a few low words with the culprit, as he is hurried onward to prison. The undertaker rushes past, wrapt up in calculating the profits he shall derive from the funeral he has just received the order "to perform;" he sees not the sweet face of the intended bride, who, leaning upon her lover's arm, is gazing with smiling looks upon the richly-decorated window, and making choice of her wedding jewels. The porter, with his load, runs against the "exquisite" in full dress, and disarranges either his carefully-twirled ringlets or jauntily-set hat; a curse or a growl is exchanged on both sides, and they again pass on. The dandy goes by, brandishing his light cane, followed by the stout and sturdy citizen, the very tapping of whose stick denotes him to be a man of substance; while the broad-built country bumpkin, with a fair cousin on each arm, occupies the whole breadth of the foot-way, and seems astonished at the rudeness of the "Lunnuners," who either jeer him as they pass, or are ever driving the red elbows of Nanny or Betty into his side. So rolls on this mighty river, with its six currents, bearing onwards those who pass and re-pass on each side of its shore-like pavement, and the rapid vehicles which glide swift as full-sailed vessels through its mid-channel.

All at once there is a stoppage; some heavily-laden waggon has broken down, and the long line of carriages of every description are suddenly brought to a stand-still—all are motionless. You see the old thoroughbred London cabman, who has promised to take his fare either east or west, as the matter be, in a given number of minutes—dodge in and out for a few seconds, through such narrow openings as no one except a real Jehu born on the stand would ever venture to move in, until he comes to the entrance of some narrow street, the ins and outs of which are only known to a few like himself, when, crack, bang, and he has vanished, giving one of his own peculiar leers at parting at the long line he has left stationary. Now there is a slow movement, and the procession proceeds at a funeral pace. The donkey-cart, laden with firewood, heralds the way, and is followed by the beautiful carriage with its armorial bearings. Behind comes the heavy dray, with its load of beer-barrels; the snail-paced omnibus follows; the high-piled waggon, that rocks and reels beneath its heavy load, next succeeds, and you marvel that it does not topple over, extinguish some dozen or so of foot-passengers, and smash in the gorgeous shop front. The wreck, which left the street so silent for a few minutes, is now drawn aside, and all is again noise and motion. The police van rolls on with its freight of crime, and is followed by the magistrate's cabriolet, as he hurries off to a West-end dinner;

"And all goes merry as a marriage bell."

In rainy weather our Londoners live and move under umbrellas, and if you glance down one of the busy streets on a wet day, you no longer wonder at the number of shopkeepers who deal in these articles. Only stand at the top of Ludgate-hill on a rainy day, and you will see each side of the street lined with umbrellas. Up and down they move in regular succession; there they are, of all sizes, prices, and qualities; silk, cotton, and oilskin; new, old, rent, and weather-stained; ever and anon the big ones come in contact with the little ones—a twist, a growl, and a stare, then on again they move. They rattle against the shop windows on the one hand, and against the omnibuses on the other; and the activity of one or another is at times wonderful; it is here and there and everywhere, in and out, "like a dog in a fair;" now diving edgeways, now soaring aloft, then hurrying over the pavement, anon upright again, until it is lost to the eye amid the great fleet of umbrellas. Meantime, cabs and omnibuses roll along, and splash the passers-by, gratis, and sometimes a stone that is not properly placed, lies like a trap, and jets up a fountain of liquid mud on the first unwary passenger that chances to plant his foot upon it. When the gas is lighted, you see the shadows of men glide along the glittering pavement heels uppermost.

What must the unpaved and muddy London which our forefathers traversed in their daily rounds have been! The King could not open Parliament in wet weather, unless fagots were first thrown into the deep pits and ruts. Foot and carriage-way had no other distinction than a row of posts; and if the passenger missed running his head against the low pent-house-lids, which here and there projected over the way, ten to one he came to some opening where a grim-headed and grinning spout sent down its torrent of water from the old-fashioned gabled building, and drenched him to the very skin; if he rushed out into the road, there

"Laden carts with thundering waggons meet, Wheels clash'd with wheels, and barr'd the narrow street."

The roads of London were full of pits and hollows, even in William and Anne's time; and the coach-box was then a box indeed—a regular coach-repairer's shop on a small scale, for, to get through a long street, in bad weather, without either sticking fast, breaking down, turning over, or being turned over by some reckless carman, was something to boast about in those days. The coachman had then need to be a good hand at repairs, and was oftener seen tinkering up his vehicle than mounted on his box, which, in time, was covered with the hammer-cloth, to conceal the materials and implements which almost every hour were called into use. What a night journey was in these old, unpaved streets, may be readily imagined, when it is known that there were not more than a thousand lamps to light the whole city—that these were only kept burning until midnight during one-half of the year, and the remainder of the season were never once lighted. Such was the London we now live in a hundred years ago. Little link-boys then generally lay in wait at the corner of every street, either ready, for a few pence, to light the benighted wanderer home, or, more probably, to lead him astray, and extinguish the light at some dangerous spot, where the thieves he was associated with were in waiting. Gay, in his "Trivia," has admirably described what the thoroughfares of London were in his day.

How different are the streets of the metropolis now, with their long level lines of gaslights, looking, in the distance, as if they touched each other; as if, far away, along the fronts of the houses, ran long streaks of fire. And through many of these vast and beautifully lighted streets may the thoughtful man now sometimes wander after midnight, and scarcely hear the sound of a foot-fall, except his own. Now and then the policeman passes, "timing his beats to a minute," or a field of light is the welcome distant across the pavement, as the door of some tavern is opened to disgorge the late revellers, the sound of whose voices for a few moments startles the surrounding silence—and then all again is still, and the heart of the mighty city is at rest. Or a solitary cab rolls by, awakening a thousand strange echoes which never fall upon the ear of day, but are only heard in the deep hush of the unseeing streets at midnight. You might fancy that you were walking through a deserted city; that the silent houses were the tombs of the dead, and those lights the everlasting lamps which burnt for ever before the high-piled sepulchres. In the grey dawn of the early morning, those streets have also a strange, dreamy kind of half-awakening look. In some streets, at such an hour, when not a soul is seen moving, you might imagine that you had come unaware upon a charmed city, where all things were ever the same, where nothing ever moved or changed, but slept motionless for evermore, beneath the spell of the hidden enchanter. In other places, the night knows no silence; there the sons and daughters of riot are never at rest: by these noisy haunts must we pass as we journey onward through the midnights of London, with its "Wilderness of steeples peeping

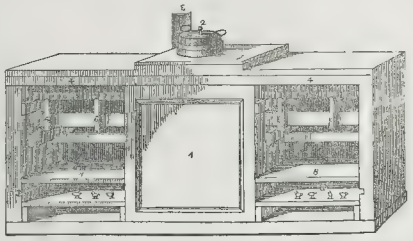
On tip-toe through their sea-coal canopy."

MR. CANTELO'S PATENT HYDRO-INCUBATOR, FOR HATCHING CHICKENS.

MR. CANTELO, the inventor of this new incubator, has had the honour of submitting the same to Prince Albert, at Windsor Castle; and his Royal Highness having inspected the apparatus, it has since been shown to her Majesty.

The machine itself is very simple: it consists of a cistern of hot water, which is heated by a peculiar stove (No. 2), the heat of which is shown by a thermometer (No. 3). This water is heated to 109 degs., and flows over a surface of vulcanised caoutchouc (No. 4, 4), the lower surface of which is in contact with a tray or nest of eggs (No. 5, 5), and maintains a heat of 106 degs. The tray is open at the sides, the bottom is made of wire gauze, lined with cotton canvass, and is raised or lowered by wedges (No. 6, 6, 6), thus merely presenting a small surface to the lower surface of the caoutchouc, which represents the breast of the parent fowl, and thus only a top contact heat is communicated to the egg. Around the stove is a warm chamber (No. 7), in which the chickens are put as soon as hatched, and where they remain about thirty-six hours before taking food; they are then placed under the Hydro-Mothers (No. 8, 8), which consist of a series of pipes, kept at a same heat of 106 degs., and under which the chickens nestle as under a real mother.



There is now no further trouble. During the first ten days the chickens feed themselves in the house, and are then only permitted to go out in the open air, returning at pleasure to the protection of the Hydro-Mother. At the end of six weeks they are put into a common roosting-house, and henceforth left to shift for themselves.

The Engraving B is a figure of a large Hydro-Mother, 44 feet long. The warm-water pipes are placed about four inches from the ground, and a moveable board is so placed that the backs of the youngest chicks just touch the pipes, the board being lowered as the chickens increase in size.

It has hitherto been believed that the blood-heat of the feathered tribe was the same as that of the human race, viz. 98 degs. Mr. Cantelo asserts that it is 106 degs., and he invites public discussion on this point; and he is ever ready and willing to demonstrate this important, though, as he considers, overlooked fact. The other point is the manner in which this heat is conveyed to the egg to vivify it. This he as clearly proves is only by contact on the top. The principle of vitality floats in the egg, and is constantly on the top, thus presenting itself to the bird's breast, leaving the other part exposed to the ordinary heat of the surrounding atmosphere; and, as the blood-vessels form, the heat is conducted to every part of the egg.

The Hydro-Incubator is exhibited at No. 209, Regent-street; as also at Mr. Cantelo's Model Farm, at Chiswick; where he has more than 2000 head of poultry running about, from one day to three months old.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

PARIS, Thursday.

The fifth performance of Auber's new three-act opera, entitled "Haydée; ou, le Secret," takes place to-night. Its success has been enormous. The houses at the Théâtre de l'Opéra Comique have been nightly crowded to excess; and, what is very unusual at this lyric establishment, the favourite pieces have received rapturous encores on every occasion. "Haydée" will certainly rank as one of Auber's happiest inspirations. I think it is second only to his "Massaniello." "Haydée" is not of the comic opera school: it is as entirely a great lyric work; and it was, in fact, originally written for the Académie Royale. It is replete with gorgeous spectacle and highly dramatic situations. The characters are thus distributed:—Haydée (a Greek slave), Mdlle. Lavoye; Rafaela (ward of Lorédan), Mdlle. Grimm; Lorédan (Venetian Admiral), M. Roger; Malipieri (his chief captain), M. Herman Leon; Andrea Donato (volunteer), M. Audran; Domenico (his Admiral's bostswain), M. Ricquier. The action passes, in the first act, in a Venetian province at Zara, in Dalmatia, in the palace of the Governor of Zara. The overture is sparkling, opening with a lovely air for the oboe, which is afterwards heard in the opera. The curtain draws up on a banquet of the Admiral and the officers of his fleet, with Greek slaves waiting on them. A pretty dancing chorus is sung by Lorédan and his followers. Malipieri tries to provoke the Admiral to play, but the latter shrinks with horror from the challenge, alleging, as an excuse, however, that the fleet is to return to Venice on the morrow, and that an attack is expected from a Turkish squadron. This horror of gaming on Lorédan's part is the key to the story. In early days he was a player, and had in a moment of strong temptation, when on the eve of ruin, cheated his opponent, Donato, by substituting higher dice than the latter had thrown. Remorse seizes him, and he strives to expiate his crime by giving to Donato's descendants their and his own wealth. In the first act all the characters are introduced: the Admiral, brave, gallant, chivalrous, but full of grief and remorse; Malipieri, his chief captain, jealous of Lorédan's fame, and revengeful; Andrea, who loves Rafaela, after being rejected and insulted by Malipieri, enters as a volunteer on board the Admiral's ship; Haydée, a slave, taken by Malipieri, and sold by him to Lorédan; Rafaela, the Admiral's ward, and Domenico, a bluff and brave seaman, who is devotedly attached to his commander. Malipieri, in the finale of the first act, discovers the secret of Lorédan's sadness, whilst the latter is in a state of somnambulism. Roger's acting and singing in this scene defy all description. It must be seen to be appreciated. It is one of the finest exhibitions of tragic force I have ever witnessed. His convulsed whisper of "Six et quatre," the number with which he has defeated his opponent at the supposed game, which he goes through, thrilled the auditory.

The second act passes on the deck of the Admiral's ship of war. It is a striking scene, although our Gallic naval builders seem to have mixed up all kinds of models for their Venetian man of war. A battle symphony, well scored, opens the act, and then there is the cry of victory at the defeat of the Turkish fleet. A very dramatic concerted piece takes place when Malipieri taunts Lorédan with the fatal numbers, "Six et quatre." A delicious cavatine, "Ah! que ses accents," is sung by Haydée, and then Haydée has an air, "C'est la corvette," one of the most charming compositions ever heard, as strongly marked by originality as it is by its ravishing stream of melody. She describes the vessel waiting for the breeze to fill her sails, and the sailors and Domenico, who listen to her, in a refrain, and by their undulating action, afford the notion of the ship being gently set in motion. The orchestration of this gem is finely conceived, and the effect of the whole is so enchanting that it takes the house by storm. Mdlle. Lavoye sang it very neatly. A great duo takes place between Lorédan and Malipieri, in which the latter discloses that he is in possession of the Admiral's dreaded secret, and demands the ship taken from the Turks by the heroic Andrea, although it has been promised to the latter by Lorédan at Haydée's request. Lorédan, however, on learning that the brave volunteer, Andrea, is the son of Donato, awards the prize in an air, "Il est à toi," in which Roger quite electrified the audience. The act terminates with Malipieri's vows of vengeance, and the arrival of the fleet at "beautiful Venice."

In the third act, Lorédan is about to wed his ward Rafaela, but, on hearing that she is attached to Andrea, at once assigns her to the son of Donato, and then it is discovered that Haydée is of the blood-royal of Cyprus, and has been richly ransomed, and that she loves the Admiral, who is covered with honours by the Venetians, and is elected Doge. Unfortunately, Malipieri is on the point of denouncing his secret, but Haydée gives herself and fortune to the former, rather than be new Doge's dishonour should be proclaimed. Andrea, insulted by Malipieri, in the first act, provokes him to a duel, and the latter being killed, Haydée is free, and the Admiral's secret remains unrivulged, the whole concluding with the double marriage of Lorédan and Haydée, and Andrea and Rafaela. There are marches and processions of all kinds in the last act. Haydée has a grand scena, with a bravura in Auber's brilliant style. Andrea has an elegant barcarole; Lorédan, a captivating romance; but the great morceau is the duo between Roger and Mdlle. Lavoye, scarcely inferior in interest to the duo of Valentine and Raoul in the "Huguenots."

Auber's "Haydée" is certainly a magnificent production: in no opera has he developed the charm and grace of exquisite orchestration in a higher degree: his airs are haunting, and his concerted pieces broad and effective. But Scribe, the author, has committed one fault, which may, perhaps, prevent "Haydée" from being heard every where. He has created such a difficult part in the Admiral, that we do not think there is any artist in Europe who could attempt it, after Roger. The latter, in addition to the charm of his voice as a tenor, combines the qualities of a great tragedian. Lorédan is a part for a Macready or a Phelps. It is stated that Jullien intends to give "Haydée" at Drury-Lane. This seems impossible without altering the character of the Admiral. The interest of the piece would be destroyed in him, and if the artist be not up to the mark who is the representative, the piece must inevitably fail. Roger has covered himself with glory by his consummate skill. He is engaged for the Académie Royale de Musique, where he will make his début in November, in Meyerbeer's long-promised opera of the "Prophète," which he has yielded at last to MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan, on the condition that they should engage Mdme. Pauline Viardot Garcia and M. Roger. The last singer has signed, but Viardot has refused the offers made to her. I think, however, that she will ultimately be the prima donna of the Académie, as she will not like to refuse Meyerbeer if he asks her.

Verdi's "Jerusalem" no longer draws at the Académie; and great haste is making for the new ballet of "Les Cinq Sens," by Dumanoir and Mazilier, for Carlotta Grisi. Mdlle. Marmet, from Lyons, has just made a successful début at the Académie.

I witnessed "Il Barbiere," on Tuesday, at the Italiens. Madame Persiani is still the unrivalled mistress of fioriture: she was applauded with furore. Mario, who has recovered from a two months' attack of the influenza, sang delightfully in the Count. Lablache's Bartolo, Ronconi's Figaro, and Tagliafico's Basil, convulsed the house with laughter. Alboni appears on Monday in the "Donna del Lago" in Malcolm; Grisi being the Lady of the Lake; Mario, the Royal James; Gardoni, Roderich Dhu; and Colletti, the father of Elena.

Mr. Lumley is here, preparing for the opening of the campaign at Her Majesty's Theatre. He endeavoured to obtain a change of the congé for Carlotta Grisi, in order that she might open the season, but the directors of the Académie cannot spare her. Messrs. Delafield and Windsor, the lessees of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, are also here, organising their forces for the season 1848. Mr. Bate has just returned from London. Meyerbeer remains in Paris for the present. Mdlle. Lucile Grahn, who a few days since gained a prize in the German lottery of 200,000 francs, is here. Her mother had the misfortune to break her leg only two days after Mdlle. Grahn heard of her good fortune.

DONIZETTI.—The celebrated composer is now residing at Bergamo, his native place, and his state of health is somewhat improved. He has recovered a little of his bodily activity; but, when spoken to, he looks at the speaker without answering, and at length shuts his eyes.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The great French actor, M. Bocage, formerly leading performer at the Porte St. Martin Theatre (where he "created" the character of Buridan, in the "Tour de Nesle," and several other celebrated parts), and now of the Odéon, made his first appearance before an English audience on Monday evening. It speaks well for Mr. Mitchell's spirit and liberality that we have so eminent a member of the Parisian stage performing on our boards. Himself the manager of the Odéon, an author of some ability, and the idol of the dramatic portion of the Parisians—which portion is pretty well a whole—some weighty inducements must have been held out to him to cross the Channel. From his gratifying reception on Monday, we believe Mr. Mitchell will have no cause to repent of his engagement.

The piece in which he appeared is a five-act drama, called "Echec et Mat," and in its structure, as we heard it generally observed, bears some resemblance to "Don Cæsar de Bazan"—one of the numerous translations of which, if we mistake not, was termed "Check to the King," or something similar. It is a drama entirely of intrigue, in which an amorous Spanish King (M. Montaland), a treacherous Prime Minister (M. Lemaître), and a noble Castilian gentleman (M. Bocage), are all playing against one another—the latter at last winning the game, by a series of bold and ingenious manœuvres, preserving, at the same time, everybody's honour as well as his own. The acting of M. Bocage was, throughout, most comfortable. Every word, every action, had its meaning; and a crowded and distinguished audience were deeply interested in the progress of the piece.

We do not know how the interests of the St. James's Theatre may be working, but we think it would prove attractive were Mr. Mitchell to produce, during M. Bocage's engagement, one or two of the powerful dramas in which he used to appear with such great effect at the Porte St. Martin. His Buridan—perhaps, also, Perrinet Leclerc, and some others—would show him to the greatest advantage, and would be certain to attract large audiences by their novelty.

On Wednesday evening, the French version of the "Antigone" of Sophocles was produced, according to promise, at the St. James's Theatre, with the whole of the music composed for it by Mendelssohn; to give the effect to which an admirable orchestra had been arranged, and put under the able direction of Mr. Benedict.

"Antigone" has been played twice before in London—at Covent Garden, two or three years ago; and at the Haymarket last season, on the occasion of Mr. Farren's benefit, Miss Vandenhoff and Miss Helen Faucit respectively playing the heroine. On its first production, it created some sensation. The music of Mendelssohn was sufficient to attract all the connoisseurs; and the tragedy itself, as a curiosity, drew the general public. Indeed, it was deeply interesting to watch its progress, and to find that its simple affecting story had the same hold upon the sympathies of an audience in the present time as when it was first produced, nearly 2300 years ago. The plot is generally known. In the fewest words, Antigone has buried the corpse of her brother, Polinices, who has been rebelling against his uncle, Creon, King of Thebes. By so doing, she incurs the punishment of death; she is to be buried alive. Tiresias, a blind seer, foretells that great calamity would arise from this unjust sentence. Creon hastens to free Antigone, but finds her dead with her lover, his son, Hamon. Eurydice, Creon's wife, kills herself on hearing the news; and, finally, Creon is left miserable and alone.

The music of "Antigone" has been so frequently written about that it is our province, at present, rather to notice the manner in which it was performed, than to analyse or comment upon it. Certainly, its execution at the St. James's Theatre is superior to what it was at Covent-Garden. At the same time, we should add that, now and then, the musicians and chorus were a little unsteady, requiring all Mr. Benedict's care and tact to keep them together. This might be, in a measure, owing to the chorus having to sing in a foreign tongue; for they were mostly English, many being obtained from Drury-Lane, through the courtesy of M. Jullien. The orchestra was formed by a band of some fifty choice performers; and they, in addition to the music of the tragedy, performed Mendelssohn's A Minor symphony, by way of overture, with excellent effect, taken as a whole.

The play was excellently performed, in spite of the comparative weakness of the adaptation of M. Bocage, the original representative of Creon, at the Odéon, took a new view of the character. He did not endue it with the classical severity and stateliness which made Mr. Vandenhoff's assumption of it so impressive; but he played it with great dramatic power, no less effective, especially towards the close of the tragedy, when misery, ruin, and calamity are heaped upon his head. Madame Rabut Fechter was the Antigone, and she acted with equal force; the celebrated scene in which she anticipates the fearful horrors of her doom being acted with exceeding intensity. The other characters were all well supported, but the ear of the audience is scarcely yet accustomed to listen to classical subjects given out in the French language; and this must be, generally, taken into consideration.

Mr. Muir has painted the scene of the theatre admirably: the idea given of the Greek stage is perfect; the floor is raised, and the chorus is placed below and in front, as before, on each side of the altar of Bacchus. We must add that the same care and intelligence is visible throughout the entire mise en scène. The costumes (which by the way are Greek, instead of the old well-known Roman) are judiciously designed; and the entire effect is artistic and classical.

Finally, "Antigone" was most successful. Taken as an entire performance, we have not, until Wednesday last, seen it in such perfection; and it will even be more complete on succeeding representations.

That several will be given, and with increased attraction, there can be no doubt.

The theatre was brilliantly attended, and every nook was occupied.

OLYMPIC.

It is long since we have witnessed such a scene of enthusiasm and excitement as the Olympic Theatre presented on Monday evening, when Mr. Gustavus Brooke—a gentleman who had already attained a high position in the provinces as a tragedian—made his first appearance before a London audience: it is true that in the earlier portions of the play, "Othello," much of the applause was due to the continued and most injudicious support of his friends; but, as the tragedy went on, all alike were wrought up to the highest pitch of admiration, and cheers and plaudits rang through the house, such as, we expect, have not been heard since the days of Edmund Kean.

In a word, Mr. Gustavus Brooke achieved an eminent, triumphant success—one that is likely to go on increasing until it places him upon the very topmost height of his profession. His first appearance enlisted the audience in his favour, his figure being graceful and finely shaped; his features handsome, and capable of immense expression; and his voice of singular weight and clearness: indeed, he will, we think, appear even to more advantage in a larger house. Up to the third act, however, although the applause was liberal, he did not make any extraordinary impression, beyond what an acknowledged tragedian might be expected to produce; but in the scene with Iago, for which he appeared to have husbanded all his powers, he came out so magnificently that the whole audience of the pit and stalls rose nearly en masse, and such a confusion of cheering, waving hats and handkerchiefs, and ringing approbation, we repeat, we have not seen for some years—excepting, perhaps, Mr. Nisbett's reception, when she returned to the Haymarket. From this to the end of the play, it was a continued triumph.

Mr. Brooke's success was honest, legitimate, and, we are certain, enduring. He made none of the old traditional points, nor did he imitate any preceding or contemporary performer. But there was nature and intelligence in every line he uttered; not an emphasis was misplaced; and he managed every inflection of his voice and expression of his countenance—to the latter of which the darkened visage of the Moor is so disadvantageous—with most consummate skill. This was finely shown in the look of deep misery and anguish which followed the words "Othello's occupation's gone!" and which was instantaneously recognised. Never, since Kean's first appearance, was a position so incontestably and suddenly attained.

The other parts were played as well as they could be by the present dramatic company of the Olympic; but all interest and attention was centred in Mr. Brooke. Mr. Stuart was the Iago, Mr. H. Holl Cassio, and Miss Stuart Desdemona, and they acquitted themselves respectably.

We must protest loudly against the disgraceful riot which was made in the gallery during the entire play—even to the stopping one of the scenes, and calling forward some one to entreat silence. From the language hurled from one blackguard to another, without check or expulsion, it was scarcely proper for ladies to remain in the house, throughout which everything spoken was tolerably audible. Whether more were admitted than the place could accommodate; or whether those at the side could not see, we are not aware; but the management will gain little by Mr. Brooke's success, if the annoyance—and something worse—of some hundreds of half-inebriated ruffians in most unsavoury proximity, is to be winked at for the sake of their sixpences. It would be a bold coup; but we believe that the prices might be raised during Mr. Brooke's engagement, both with advantage to the treasury, and to the comfort of the audience.

We heard a characteristic anecdote of Mr. Brooke, from a member of the profession who sat near us in the stalls, which we give as we received it. Mr. Brooke had been before engaged, and underlined at one of the large houses where an eminent tragedian of the present day was in power. An announcement of "Hamlet" was sent to him, in which he found he was to play Laertes to the other's Prince of Denmark. He immediately wrote back to say that he was only in the habit of performing one part in the play, and that was Hamlet, and that the other might play the Ghost if he chose. The engagement was accordingly broken.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The rogue and fool by fits is fair and wise,
And even the best, by fits, what they despise.—POPE.

"The business of the country," inasmuch, at least, as regards the Turf districts, has already come under the consideration of the Parliament which assembles at Hyde Park Corner—the new session commencing on Monday last. Mr. Tattersall having resigned office, the duties of his Augean department devolve upon a committee, which announced its policy to be that of thorough reform—searching inquiries into long-standing abuses, and stringent measures for their remedy and removal. The members of the new House will be required to qualify as to probity as well as property—a test, carried into effect, which will also provide against any inconvenience that might arise from a crowd. Whether a mixed government will succeed in accomplishing that which was a failure under an absolute power, remains to be seen. There is plenty to occupy the talent and time of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, Ministers for Home and Foreign Affairs, and County assessors of all denominations. If these set aside private or public interests, they will not only have the honour of being the founders of a system, but as standing before the world as modern instances of the wise and which assigns to virtue the privilege of rewarding itself. The attempt to make the Ring a "little modest," is worthy these days of enterprise and ingenuity. The extraction of a double-tooth has been made the medium of enjoyment; and events are communicated, by means of electric telegraphs, considerably before they take place. Why then should we despair of seeing "legs" becoming "all honourable men;" or persons of condition refraining from their company, so long as they continue most unquestionable rogues?

And, speaking of those who chance to fall into a position "suspect of lame," it must be said—though with the heaviest grief—that the most rational of all our national sports is, at this moment, less agreeably situated than its friends might desire. There cannot be a doubt that Yachting is labouring under a surveillance by no means befitting the flag under which it sails. A Government prosecution is in progress against a foreign nobleman—a member of one of our leading clubs—for smuggling. His yacht has been captured by the officers of Customs; and, to say the least of it, "there's a dirty look-out ahead." But this is not the worst by a great deal. A few days ago, the secretary of this same club received a notification from the authorities, that the Lords of the Treasury were pleased to refuse it the privileges vouchsafed to other societies of its class. How, the upshot of all this will assuredly turn out to be that yacht sailors will make worse weather of it in port than they were wont—and, only that we abhor the suspicion of a pun, we might add in wines and spirits generally. The courtesies of Excise grow colder and colder, and all because one man was found (out) amongst them with a relish for cognac, duty free. True, he pleads ignorance, and classes himself among the second order of those stated in our prefatory couplet, to be occasionally "fair and wise:" but the cry is up, and well-meaning people have no doubt that every small yacht afloat is engaged in contraband ventures, with a shrewd notion that the large craft do not neglect opportunities for a bit of quiet piracy. . . . . Well, the turf has a legthe billow its free-trader, the field its poacher, and every condition of life its sharp practitioner; and what is the lore we gather from all this partial evil: That "Honesty is the best policy."—Gentlemen of the Committee of Tattersall's, inscribe this maxim in the most conspicuous part of the Subscription Room, for assuch as its philosophy appeals to the whole human race—to the few, for its sake of principle—to the many, for the sake of interest.

SHERIFFDOM OF ABERDEEN.—Mr. James Crauford, advocate depute, is understood to have received this appointment, vacated by the promotion of Mr. Gordon to the Sheriffdom of Edinburgh.

IRELAND.

The Lord Chancellor's health is improving.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION IN LIMERICK.—Tuesday, the day on which the Commission was opened, was engaged in fixing the panels of the Petty Juries; in the finding of bills by the Grand Jury, to whom an able address was delivered by Chief Justice Blackburn; and in arraigning several of the accused parties.—On Wednesday, William Ryan (known by the soubriquet of Pack) was placed at the bar, charged with the wilful murder of John Kelly, at Knocksanty, in the county Limerick, on the 22nd of September, 1847. The prisoner appeared about twenty years of age. The Jury, after a lengthened trial, without leaving the box, found the prisoner "Guilty." The Lord Chief Baron pronounced sentence of death on the unhappy prisoner, and fixed the 7th of February next as the day of execution.—Patrick Bourke, for attempting to burn a dwelling-house of Christopher Millar, at Coolybrown, was convicted, and sentenced to be transported for life. William Fraser was found guilty of having harboured in his house William Ryan (Pack), the convict above mentioned, and was sentenced to transportation for life.

On Tuesday, the lady of the Solicitor-General, who is at present engaged at the Special Commission in Limerick, died suddenly at ten o'clock A.M., of disease of the heart.

TENANT-RIGHT.—The movement is rapidly extending. A new Repeal journal (the Doublin Patriot) publishes a requisition, numerously signed, for a meeting of the clergy, gentry, merchants, and landholders of Ballybay, in the county of Monaghan, to be held on Tuesday, the 11th instant, for the purpose of petitioning both Houses of Parliament for—"1. A bill to legalise the tenant-right of Ulster. 2. A bill to amend the present Poor-law, by relieving the tenant farmers from that oppressive burden. 3. A bill to regulate the fair and equitable amount of rent to be paid by the occupying tenant, and also to ask for the redress of such grievances as press heavily on all her Majesty's subjects in Ireland."

INJURIOUS EFFECTS OF CHLOROFORM.—At a recent meeting of the Surgical Society of Ireland, Mr. Stapleton stated that he had lately tried chloroform in some cases in Jervis-street Hospital. One man was put into a sound sleep, but awoke in about a minute afterwards, and expressed himself as having been conscious of everything that was done to him: while apparently unconscious, he said that he had felt himself punched, and so forth, but was unable to resist or give any indication of feeling. A resident pupil of the hospital had tried it a day or two ago, and was very merry during its action; to-day he again tried it, and was put to sleep in two minutes, but recovered in two minutes more, and shortly after began laughing in an hysterical manner, and soon fell into violent convulsions, so as to require the united efforts of several pas, le to hold him down in bed: he then had rigors, cold perspirations, and sickness of the stomach; his pulse sometimes fell very low; and when the excitement was coming on, it would rise to 100. He remained in this uncertain state for two hours, and then expressed a wish to sleep. Under the operation of the chloroform there was a complete loss of muscular power, except during the convulsions.

ALLEGED DENUNCIATION OF THE LATE MAJOR MAHON. The Freeman's Journal contains a declaration, signed by a considerable number of the inhabitants of Strokestown and its vicinity, in which they state that they have heard with the utmost surprise and indignation the calumnious assertions contained in letters in the public press, and reported by the newspapers to have been made in the Houses of Lords and Commons, against the unsullied character of their beloved and revered pastor, the Very Rev. Michael M'Dermott, the Venerable Archdeacon of Elphin; and that they feel it to be a duty incumbent upon them to come forward and offer the most unqualified denial and contradiction to those false assertions. They then say:—"Now we hereby, without fear of contradiction, and bold ourselves in readiness to confirm this our solemn declaration, by our sworn affidavits in any court of justice, that we have been invariably in the habit of attending at mass on all Sundays and holidays in the year in the chapel of Strokestown; that we have a distinct recollection of our having heard mass in the chapel of Strokestown on Monday, the 1st of November, called All Saints' Day, being the day before Major Mahon was murdered, and that the Very Rev. Michael M'Dermott, our parish priest, did not open his lips to address one word to his flock on that day. We further unhesitatingly declare that we never heard the Very Rev. Michael M'Dermott, on Sunday, or holiday, or Saint's day, or on any other day on which he ever addressed his flock from the altar, denounce the late Major Mahon, or express the words attributed to him in the reported speech of Lord Farnham, or any such words, or any words of similar import or meaning. LUKE CARLOS, grocer," &c.

THREATENING NOTICE AGAINST THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY.—The Rev. Henry Brennan, parish priest of Kilglass, Roscommon, has addressed, through the Evening Post, a letter to the LORD-Lieutenant, in which he states that he has received, through the Post-office, a threatening letter, of which he supplies a copy. The letter contains a resolution, passed by twelve individuals, calling themselves Protestants, binding them by oath to retaliate by murdering the priests of the parishes in which any murder may be committed by the peasantry. Mr. Brennan adds:—"I understand similar ones have been sent to all the parochial Catholic clergy in this county. Your Excellency may perceive, by the description of paper, the scroll and style of writing, and the fact of its being posted in Dublin, that it must be the production of persons moving in a respectable sphere, and who evidently could do it better if th y pleased. It is my firm conviction, and of those with whom I have been speaking on the subject, that they have been fabricated by a junta of rabid parsons, for the purpose of reviving religious bigotry and sectarian animosities, which every good man should deprecate."

ASSASSINATION.—On Tuesday night last, between eight and nine o'clock, at Ballydine, within four or five miles of Cashel, a small farmer named Thomas Brown was shot dead within a few yards of his own house, on the high road. He received five pellets in the breast, and his death was instantaneous.

DEATHS BY DESTITUTION.—There are reports, with heartrending details, of three deaths from extreme destitution, within the past week in the barony of Erris, county of Mayo. Two deaths in the county of Kerry, and two in the county of Galway, from the same dreadful cause. In the mountainous and boggy districts of the west, extreme destitution has set in, owing to the consumption of the small crops of potatoes, and the expenditure of the money savings from the late harvest.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

As our young-lady friends are "at home" during the present festive season, we venture to submit for their study, in the holidays, a theme which we trust will be found more inviting than "French Exercises" usually are (but which for the future we shall give in English), viz. a chapter on

LES MODES.

L'étude de la langue Française est si universellement répandue dans toutes les familles Anglaises, que nous avons pensé qu'une page consacrée à la revue des modes, et à tous les petits ouvrages des dames, serait favorablement accueilli par toutes les mères de famille et les jeunes personnes, qui trouveront ainsi une facilité de plus à cultiver le Français, et un plaisir toujours nouveau dans ces ouvrages sans cesse renouvelés que nous ferons successivement passer sous leurs yeux. Dans son organisation supérieure, notre siècle méconnaît trop souvent les véritables conditions de la vie, il décore du nom de félicité la richesse, l'ambition satisfaite, . . . vanité d'un éphémère succès. En cela ne croyez pas à la voix du siècle. Elle pénètre jusque dans les studieuses solitudes des pensions; elle trouble parfois le cercle intime de famille; et souvent on rêve à ces fées bienfaisantes, qui donnaient perles, voitures et dentelles. Ces fées-là se trouvaient jadis au bord des ruisseaux, sur la lisière des bois: elles portaient des noms charmants, elles avaient de belles baguettes et de douces surprises; elles ont changé de nom aujourd'hui; elles s'appellent le 'Travail, l'Ordre et la Simplicité.

Pour trouver le bonheur, dit Bernardin de Saint Pierre, il faut le chercher avec un cœur simple. Jamais pensée ne fut plus vraie. La simplicité fait pleinement jouir des dons que le ciel nous a départis, elle embellit les intérieurs les plus modestes, et pare ceux dons les plus légers de l'amitié, elle relève les succès et décore les défaites. Les cœurs simples ne prennent pas le tumulte et l'agitation pour le plaisir: au bruit ils préfèrent les veillées du coin du feu; et c'est pour les embellir et les utiliser que nous allons leur esquisser ces mille travaux, source de tant de joies, de douces surprises de famille. Nous nous occuperons des modes sous un point de vue peut-être nouveau. L'élégante simplicité est, selon l'occasion, l'indice d'une nature élevée. Et c'est une incontestable vérité qu'il y a toujours quelquechose du caractère d'une jeune personne qui se revèle dans sa toilette.

Les chapeaux d'hiver ont la forme ballon, très evasée et fermée sur le menton; le velours est indispensable. Le velours noir est toujours celui qui se porte le plus généralement, parcequ'il est plus solide que les autres, et conséquemment adopté par les mères de famille. Pour les jeunes personnes, les ornemens se font en velours; ils sont très simples: deux jarretières doubles croisées l'une sur l'autre; un nœud très léger. Les chapeaux de velours oreille d'ours, gros bleu ou vert Isly, doublés de satin blanc piqué comme les capotes, sont extrêmement distingués. Les capotes de satin, garnies de rubans de velours épinglé, ont repris la place qu'elles occupaient l'hiver passé. On porte aussi des chapeaux de satin sans aucun autre ornement que des biais de satin posés à plat sur la passe et sur la calotte. Les longues boucles sont incommodes avec la forme de ces chapeaux, mais elle est charmante avec les bandeaux: le tour de tête devient alors indispensable. On en fait beaucoup en tulle illusion bouillonné, en tulle ruché à deux rangs, entre lesquels l'on pose de loin en loin de petits velours ou de petits rubans de satin étroit, de couleur tranchant avec celle du chapeau.

Les bonnets sont très petits et très simples: les dentelles ne font pas de plis sur le front: on les garnit de rubans de taffetas découpés ou de velours; mais la blonde et les riches dentelles se marient aux fleurs.

Les robes se portent toujours longues; les corsages plats et basqués se couvrent de passementeries de tous genres, de galon de soie, de boutons carrés ou octogones recouverts en soie et brodés en chenille. Les boutons sont souvent accompagnés de glands arabes, de nœuds chinois, &c. Il y a aussi les boutons brodés en velours. Les redingotes en mérinos pour le matin se garnissent de cinq rangées de petits velours sur le devant, et sont d'une simplicité recherchée. Les manches fermées à revers garnis de petits velours reçoivent pour ornement un jockey avec les cinq petits velours posés dessus. Les étoffes pour dames sont toujours le velours, le satin, le damas à grands dessins, la damas peluné, les armures le gros d'Afrique, la moire. Ces robes se couvrent de dentelles pour soirées, dîners, ou concerts. Les jeunes personnes portent pour toilette le satin princesse, le poult de soie, la popeline unie ou écossaise: les écossaises de soie, ou de laine, jouisse à d'une grand faveur. Pour deux toilette, le drap, le cachemire d'Ecosse, les mérinos, la nuance feutre sied très bien aux jeunes filles.

La popeline qui habille merveilleusement les personnes grandes claudes, et les enfans, est beaucoup trop bouffante pour les femmes de petite taille. La popeline unie, la popeline rayée, la popeline écossaise, sont un grand succès en ce hiver.

Pour robe de fatigue, il y a le pekin de laine noir à large raies, avec leque, on fait de simples redingotes; et le drap royal de couleur foncée, dont le pointillé ressemble beaucoup à celui du repos.

Les cols se portent encore très petits, soit brodés, soit en Valenciennes. Les manchettes sont assorties à toutes les espèces de cols: on en fait de charmans pour jeune fille au tricot et au crochet. Aussi donnerons-nous dans notre première page de broderies les dessins de l'un et de l'autre, et nous détaillerons comment ils doivent être faits au tricot ou au crochet.

La forme des manteaux est toujours chose difficile à choisir. On trouve partout des pardessus bien chauds, bien commodes, mais fort peu d'une élégance gracieuse. Le mantelet marquise court par derrière, à petits pans arrondis par devant, et garni tout autour d'un haut volant garni lui-même d'un galon ou d'un effilé, et le manteau à pélerine arrondie entourée d'un effilé de petite dimension, sont les mieux portés. On fait aussi des manteaux écossais en soie avec coutures sur les épaules, n'ayant d'autres ornemens que huit boutons assortis, assez larges, posés en face les uns des autres (quatre de chaque côté), depuis le cou jusqu'au milieu de la poitrine; une petite manche en forme d'entonnoir est ajouté aux coutures. Cette manche se garnit d'une frange écossaise d'à peu près dix à douze centimètres. En général, cette année, tous les mantelets ou manteaux ont des coutures sur l'épaule.

PELOTE EN VELOURS.

Le dessin que nous donnons No. 1, dont être soutaché ou brodé en chenette sur du velours ou du casimir.

Pour broder en soutache on fait un point droit au milieu de la ganse: pour la soutache épinée on fait successivement un point de côté à droite, un autre à gauche. Le point doit être fait obliquement. Aussi est-il échelonné sur les points des deux côtés, de façon que les points du côté gauche ne se trouvent pas sur la même ligne que ceux du côté droit. La soutache verte épinée or, ou la soutache bleu epinée argent, font très bon effet.

Pour monter cette pelote soi-même, il faut faire une boîte de la forme que nous donnons, et remplir cette boîte de plomb. On peut remplacer le plomb par du plâtre; le dernier moyen est beaucoup plus économique et fait aussi bien, car il ne roulle pas les aigu lles, inconvenient que l'on a en employant le sable. Lorsque la boîte est bien pleine et bien fermée, on forme avec un morceau de grosse toile, que l'on colle à la boîte de bois, un pelote de la forme indiquée, que l'on couvre de soie comme toutes les pelotes. Lorsque cette pelote de dessous est preparée, et qu'on a collé en dessous un morceau assorti au dessus de la pelote, on pose le casimir ou le velours soutaché sur le soie en l'épingiant: puis après on ajoute la bande qui l'entoure, que l'on colle par le bas et que l'on coud à la pelote tout autour du dessin. Pour cacher ce point, on pose une ganse ou une frange tout autour.

Cette pelote en velours soutaché epiné est fort belle placée sur un bureau brodée sur de la mousseline au point de feston, et doublée de soie, elle est forte et élégante sur un e toilette, en assortissant la couleur de la soie à celle de l'ameublement.

BOURSE IMITATION FILET.

(VOIR LE MOULE DESSINE SUR LA PLANCHE NO. 3.)

Ce moule, dont la forme est celle d'un dez à coudre, a 6 cent. de largeur et 10 de longueur. Il est indispensable de faire percer dans le haut de ce moule deux rangées de trous, plus ou moins rapprochés selon la grosseur du filet qu'on veut obtenir. Ces trous doivent être contrariés. Pour preparer son travail il faut couvrir les deux rangées de points arrière très serrés. Cette reconnaissance est non necessaire, car si les points sont lâches, le filet ne peut être régulier. Le fil doit être en fil fort; l'on enfile ensuite une longue aiguillée de la soie que l'on a choisie pour la bourse, que l'arrête bien sur le fil, on forme avec la soie une boucle que l'on soutient avec le pouce gauche, et on repasse l'aiguille dans le fil du bas, en formant le point de feston. Il faut avoir soin de bien tourner son point sur le fil juste entre les deux trous, et de tirer l'aiguille bien droit et bien serré, comme pour le feston. On soutient ensuite la soie sous le pouce gauche, et on forme le nœud du filet en passant l'aiguille sous le fil, ensuite sur la maille de soie que l'on vient de former à gauche, et sous la soie que l'on maintient avec le pouce gauche. Si l'on a compris cette explication, l'on a formé un nœud; l'on fait ainsi une maille entre chaque trou le plus régulièrement possible, sur la première et la deuxième rangée. Au troisième tour et à tous les suivants, on forme le point de feston et le nœud sur la maille du rang supérieur, puisqu'il n'y a plus de bâti, et l'on continue toujours en tournant. Lorsque la bourse est près d'être terminée, on diminue, comme dans le filet ordinaire, en sautant une maille de temps à autre. Il est très facile d'ajouter des perles à ce filet. Le travail est le même : après avoir formé le point de feston on enfile la perle, on la soutient avec le pouce gauche, et on forme le nœud comme nous l'avons indiqué. Une bourse de soie noire avec des perles d'or produit un effet très distingué. On coupe la soie, lorsqu'il faut la rallonger, par un nœud de tisserand le plus près possible du nœud de la maille. Cette bourse se termine par un gland de perles. On peut la fermer par une coulisse que l'on fait au crochet. Si on préfère la fermer avec un diable ou un fermoir, il suffit d'arrêter la soie à la moitié du moule, de chaque côté, pour former les deux ouvertures nécessaires pour le fermoir ou le diable; les tours suivants se font, bien entendu, sans interruption. La bourse terminée, on coupe en dedans du moule les deux rangs de fil du bâti.

FAIS CE COUPON POUR LA BANDE DU PLOMB.

CLOCHETTE.

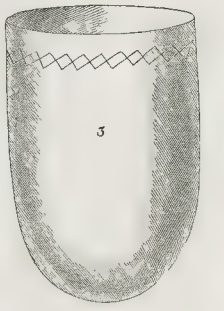
Le moule dont nous donnons le dessin est en bois. Avant de commencer cette fleur, il faut entrer dans le haut du moule un fil de fer, formant boucle; ceci fait, on passe dans cette boucle un laiton fin en cuivre, on l'arrête en le tortillant, et on vient le passer en le conduisant tout droit dans un trou près des bords du moule; on le repasse par dessous dans le trou à côté, puis on le remonte, tout droit dans la boucle de fil de fer. Il y a dix trous au bas du moule, c'est donc cinq fois qu'il faut recommencer cette explication. Ceci fait il y a sur le moule dix biais de laiton posés à peu près comme les baleines d'un parapluie, larges du bas, et se touchant au haut du moule. Il faut ensuite passer dans les trous irréguliers, qui se trouvent au dessus de ceux du bas du moule, du fil de laiton fin en cuivre, de manière à former un cercle de cuivre sur le moule. Pour cela il suffit de faire alternativement un espèce de grand point arrière, et de petit point arrière; le tour de laiton n'est posé que pour soutenir la fleur tandis qu'on la forme, car, lorsque le moule est couvert de laine jusqu'à cet endroit, on coupe ce laiton devenu inutile.



BOURSE IMITATION FILET DESSIN.

Maintenant, voici la manière de former une clochette ou convolvulus; par exemple, une clochette bleue. Vous enfilez une aiguille de laine blanche douce, et pas trop grosse, vous la fixez dans le fil de fer formant boucle, et vous commencez la fleur en faisant un point arrière sur chaque laiton de cuivre; on fait plusieurs tours ainsi bien réguliers, ni trop lâches, ni trop serrés; à peu près à la hauteur d'un centimètre, il faut casser la laine, prendre de la jaune orange, former un nœud de tisserand, faire quelques tours avec cette laine, toujours à point arrière; vous rattachez ensuite de la laine jaune claire, pour en faire quelques tours. Voilà le cœur de la clochette terminé. Pour faire la fleur, c'est toujours le même travail, très facile du reste, seulement on la nuance ainsi qu'il suit; quelques tours de bleu pas trop clair, quelques tours de bleu foncé, plusieurs tours de bleu moins foncé, enfin plusieurs tours de bleu clair; il ne faut pas oublier qu'arrivé au laiton qui forme le cercle, on coupe ce laiton devenu inutile.

FLEURS EN LAINE CLOCHETTE DESSIN.

Lorsque le moule est entièrement couvert de laine, on le retourne, et on coupe dans l'intérieur le laiton de cuivre entre deux trous, enfin que les bouts soient égaux; on retire la fleur du moule, et on tortille les bouts dont nous venons de parler, afin que la laine ne se défasse pas; ils sont cachés sous les rebords que forme la clochette. On passe au milieu de cette fleur des étamines que l'on achète toutes preparées et montés sur une tige, qui sert de queue à la fleur. Faite ainsi sur un moule, la clochette est très regulière et se conserve très longtemps, se trouvant soutenue par les fils de laiton. On en fait de toutes couleurs, en ayant soin de maintenir toujours la graduation des nuances ainsi que dans la bleue. Les clochettes melangées sont de charmans ornemens, dans des vases de porcelaine posés sur des guéridons.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The Illustration gives the most effective scene from Balfe's opera of "The Maid of Honour"—the "Masque of Orpheus and Eurydice," performed before Queen Elizabeth and her Court. The music throughout this episode is exceedingly effective; and its introduction was a happy thought, either of artist or composer. Miss Miran, as Orpheus, has been winning her way into high favour with the audience since her début: and her air in this scene, "Dulcet music," is one of the gems of the opera, and usually rapturously encored. Indeed, her rich impassioned voice —the "lovely oily contralto," as the Times aptly observed—is the theme of praise amongst the habitues of the theatre: and the success of the opera is to be attributed, in no small measure, to the hold she has taken on the sympathies of the audience.

MR. G. V. BROOKE.

THE life and professional career of this gentleman, who made so successful a début in the metropolis, at the Olympic Theatre, on Monday last, is by no means an uninteresting instance of the ruling passion strong in youth.

Mr. Brooke is a native of Dublin, and was born in 1818, of parents in independent circumstances. His father died in 1825, leaving a widow and five children: of the latter, Mr. Brooke is the senior. At an early age he was sent to Edgeworthstown School, then conducted by Mr. Lovell Edgeworth, brother to the celebrated Miss Edgeworth; and Mr. Brooke next prepared for Trinity College, Dublin, with the intention of joining the Irish bar. While at school young Brooke carried off several prizes for English declamation; and this early success appears to have influenced his future life. When about fifteen years old, he visited the Theatre

THE MASQUE IN BALFE'S NEW OPERA OF "THE MAID OF HONOUR," AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Royal, in Dublin, for the first time: he became, at once, stage-struck, and next morning he called upon the manager, Mr. Calcraft, in the hope of making his appearance on the stage: the manager declined, though he was much struck with young Brooke's talent for recitation. About this time Edmund Kean fell into his last illness, and could not fulfil an engagement which he had made with Mr. Calcraft, who, in this dilemma, resolved to afford Mr. Brooke a trial on the Dublin stage. He played William Tell with great success; and, afterwards, Virginius, Douglas, Rolla, &c.

Mr. Brooke has since acquired an extensive and highly merited reputation; and has played in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, Cork and Belfast, Norwich, Ipswich, Colchester, and other theatres. With this provincial experience, Mr. Brooke has tried his fortune upon the metropolitan boards; with what result, we have described in an adjoining column.

PEMBROKE COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

THIS ancient College, founded in the year 1347, by the widow of Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, having accomplished five centuries in its existence, the event was celebrated with great festivity, on Friday (New Year's Eve). A sumptuous entertainment was served on the occasion, in the old Hall of the College, which was tastefully decorated with laurel and evergreens; "but more interesting ornaments," says the Morning Post report, "were to be found in the portraits adorning the hall. Among those occupying a conspicuous place was a portrait of the founder, a copy from some older picture; and side by side with it was placed a portrait of Henry VI., whose benefactions to the College were such as justly to entitle him to the name of a second founder. At the bottom of the hall were several other portraits of eminent men who had been members of the College, among whom were Bishop Ridley and John Bradford,—names celebrated in the Reformation, which they sealed with their martyrdom; Bishop A. Galton, of Ely; Bishop Andrewes, of Manchester; and Bishop Brownrigg, of Exeter. A marble bust of the younger Pitt commemorates the fact that he, too, received his education at this College; which can also boast of having nourished the poetic fancies of Spenser and of Gray."

Among the guests present were the Vice-Chancellor of the University (Dr. Phelps), the Earl of Hardwick, Lord-Lieutenant of the county; Right Hon. Sir H. J. Fust; the Mayor of Cambridge; Right Hon. Mr. Goulburn, M.P.; Hon. Mr. Law, M.P.; Mr. Adair, M.P.; Sergeant Talfourd, M.P.; Mr. Turner, M.P.; the Dean of Bristol, the Dean of Ely, Master of Christ's, Master of Catherine Hall, Master of Jesus, Professors Oliphant, Blunt, Starkie, Scholefield, Heaviside, &c. Several invited guests were unavoidably absent; among others, the new Bishop of Durham, who was educated at Pembroke, and the Bishop of Ely.

After the removal of the cloth, several speeches were delivered; and during the festivity was used the celebrated Founder's Cup, which we have engraved.

This interesting relic is made of silver, gilded. Round the upper part of the bowl is engraved the following inscription:—

"Sayn Denes yt es me dere
For hes lof drenk and mak gud cher;"

and beneath it are two rows of ornament. On the stem of the Cup are engraved—

"M. V. God help at ned;"

the initials M. V. being those of the donor, Mary of Valencia.

M. GAVARNI.

WE have availed ourselves of the opportunity afforded by the visit of M. Gavarni to England, to give a portrait of one occupying an eminent position in the world of art—one whose reputation in England is only less than the fame he enjoys in France. Though, probably, better known here by his inimitable sketches in the Charivari than his works in a higher style, yet those who are only acquainted with those admirable reproductions of the life of the French capital are aware of but half his powers. They are but the concessions a great artist must sometimes make to a popular taste. It should be stated that in France, more frequently than in England, artists of first-rate ability throw their talent into periodical, and unfortunately too often ephemeral, publications. In the Charivari alone Gavarni has done "enough for fame." In that work appeared his sketches of Parisian life, so replete with observation and satire, which have acquired an European celebrity. Among them are the series of "Les Enfans terribles," "Les Impressions de Ménage," "Les Fourberies de Femme en Matière de Sentiment," "Les Faits et Gestes du Proprietaire," "Leçons et Conseils," "Les Parens terribles," "Le Carnival de Paris," &c. Of the last alone he has given several series; and his matchless "Debardeurs" have fixed themselves so strongly in the public mind, an impression has been almost created that he is great in this genre alone. It is a most unfounded notion, disproved by the power of hand and vivid conception displayed in his higher works, such as his illustrations to the fantastic tales of "Hoffman," the contes of the "Canon Schmidt," his sketches for a work called "La Police Correctionelle," besides the many "Physiologies" which have derived most of their character from his pencil, and are so numerous we cannot recapitulate them. Other works, too, he has "scattered abroad" over the vast field of French illustrated literature. For fertility of design and execution he may be ranked with our own Cruikshank; but in style, breadth of effect, and Rembrandt-like power, we know no English artist who can be called his parallel. Gavarni was educated as an engineer, and it was while executing drawings of machinery and scientific diagrams, that the bent of his fancy towards the graceful and grotesque in human life developed itself. He used to cover the margin of his books and plans with heads and figures; and the tendency grew on him, as he says himself, till they intruded themselves on the text, and now they have absorbed the whole sheet! Segments and diameters are no longer to be seen. But he is still attached to scientific pursuits, and continues the study of mathematics and the higher branches of mechanics. He is also a writer of tales and fugitive pieces, which would be better known were his artistic reputation less: the world seldom allows two kinds of greatness to one man. In personal manner Gavarni has all the quiet and repose of conscious power: he is modest and unassuming, speaks but little of his works, and is better pleased at discovering merit in those of others than in having it pointed out in his own.

AUSTRIA AND ITALY.

LEAGUED together for ages in an alliance of tyranny, Austria and Rome seem to have separated their policies, and they have parted to go in such different directions, that a few years of constitutional Government in the Papal States, and of obstruction to all improvement on the part of Austria, will kindle a spirit in Italy too powerful for all the confederation of Absolutism formed by the Italian provinces, supported by Austria, to resist. In the middle ages, the "Pope and the Emperor" were perpetually at war, struggling for sovereignty in Italy; when their respective mights had settled their respective rights, they joined hands, and helped each other to abuse the power they had gained, in security. Rome brought the force of opinion and influence as her contribution to the armoury of despotism; Austria lent the material element, armies and bayonets; between them the machinery that held the whole peninsula in thraldom was complete. The other States dared not depart from the policy Austria dictated to them, even had they been so inclined; and as civil liberty was practically proscribed at Rome, the German Emperor had nothing to dread; he was as absolute in Lombardy as at Vienna; the other Sovereigns were little more than his agents; there was a complete net-work of coercion over the whole land. The effect of this league between an ecclesiastical and temporal power, against political liberty, was most fatal to the material prosperity of Italy. Cities that once furnished the models of municipal institutions to Europe, degenerated to mere military colonies; States that were free for centuries, and had constitutions, charters, legislatures and statesmen, when western Europe had scarcely emerged from barbarism, sank into the provincial dependencies of a foreign power and another race. Under the benumbing influence of despotism, arts, learning, and science perished; the Italian Universities were no longer the centres and sources of the erudition of the world, and one of the most celebrated schools of philosophy has for ages been nothing but an academy of music and singing. The population of whole regions died away with the departure of manufactures and industry, till towns that could once assemble thousands of armed men at the sound of the tocsin presented, to use the expression of Algernon Sidney, "the quiet and peaceable estate of a wilderness." Granting all to be true that is written of the turbulence of these Italian republics, of their frequent wars and feuds, still it was life and motion; amid them all there was energy, the materials for life and action. There was much vice and violence doubtless, but these have been left when all the co-existent powers for good were taken away. The abuses of liberty are better

> Than the gloomy errors,
> The weeds of nations in their last decay;

which are all that Italy has presented since the establishment of a torpid and jealous despotism. The States of the Church fared even worse under the system than the provinces which fell under the dominion of Austria. The Roman system threw all the civil powers of the State into the hands of the hierarchy; the Ministers were all cardinals; the lower offices all filled by priests. Piety there may have been in abundance, but of secular wisdom there was little or none. The principle of Conservatism carried to its utmost excess, let everything fall into decay and corruption. The Executive was negligent and venal, justice was sold, the revenues wasted; the nobles, deprived of all share in the business of the State, lost even the energy necessary to attend to their own, and their large possessions were left uncultivated—all things went to ruin. Even the public charities of Rome, more numerous and more splendidly endowed than those of any city in the world, were abused, the funds diverted from their proper purpose, and absorbed by the governors and officers. It would be difficult to name any one vice that can be exhibited by incapable and corrupt rulers, that was not fully developed under the old political system of the Papal States. The decay and corruption had probably reached their worst stage under the late Pontiff, whose last days were disturbed by the apparition of railroads. A few years more of such political weakness would have ended in mere dissolution of civil bonds and social anarchy. Yet this system had the full concurrence of Austria — though in its own province the Government, however despotic, was administered with much more of worldly wisdom.

It is almost impossible for Englishmen to imagine the extent of the reforms the present Pope has introduced. Indeed the change is more than a mere reform; he has remodelled the whole State. The Constitution he has granted is one of the boldest steps ever taken, in the face of the hostility of Austria, by any Italian Prince for three centuries. We give it in another column. The most important element in it is the admission of laymen to the highest offices; only one Minister, the Secretary of State, is to be a Cardinal; the others may be clerics or laics indifferently, as their talents may fit them for their duties. In Rome this is a total revolution, scarcely to be appreciated in a country where the Clergy cannot hold even a seat in one branch of the Legislature; and, in the other House, have only the same rights as ordinary Barons; and where no greater secretary of the Church has been a Prime Minister since the days of Wolsey. It required a self-denial greater far than that of a Charles the Fifth, who merely laid down all his powers for his son to take them, in the ruler who strips himself of most of his direct authority, and continues to reign under self-imposed limitations to it. It would be absurd to suppose that the Pope entered on this policy without knowing the people to be fit to receive it, and carry it out. Political knowledge, and an aptitude for political action, must have grown up under all the repressions of the Austro-Papal system. At this moment, what a contrast there is between the State of Rome, where the citizens are at peace with each other, where the Government is popular in the extreme, and that of Milan, the centre of the Austrian power in Lombardy, where the streets are reddened by massacre, the people in rebellion, and, unable to escape from the military tyranny that keeps them in bondage, are conspiring to sap it by refraining from the use of all taxed articles that return a revenue to the Government! A great change is beginning in Italy; and, however reluctant, Austria will have to follow opinion,—or fall before it!

XANTHIAN ROOM, BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE Xanthian Room, which is just opened to the public, is one of the most interesting collection of antiquities in the British Museum; and though the sculptures are not of such exquisite beauty as those in the Elgin and Towneley collections, there is no want of elegance and character in them. The appearance of the Room on entering is more striking and impressive than any other in the Museum, arising from two lofty tombs, or sarcophagi, apparently perfect, being erected in it. We say apparently perfect, for, in reality, the whole of the masonry is not antique; but the modern portions being fitted with the utmost nicety to the old, the general aspect of the tombs is complete. On one view of the Room, these tombs are conspicuous on either hand; and the peculiar forms of their lids, resembling inverted boats, having a ridge or keel along their tops, and the singular construction of the sarcophagi themselves, merit great attention, as they are made in imitation of wooden erections, the stonework being so wrought as to appear like pieces of wood most accurately fitted together. Sir Charles Fellowes, in his work on Lycia, says, these sepulchral erections are in perfect imitation of the wooden storehouses for grain still in use, and constructed by the inhabitants of Lycia.

From the lid of the lofty sarcophagus on the left of our view are lions' heads projecting boldly forwards; and on the Lid itself, and along the ridge, as well as on the sides of the plinth, are historical subjects sculptured in good relief. This sarcophagus was constructed for the Persian Satrap Paadin, as is shown by his name being sculptured in Lycian characters on the ridge above.

The lid of the smaller tomb is also elaborately wrought with historical subjects. On the extreme right of our Illustration is seen the portion of the tomb called the Harpy Tomb, from representations of harpies carrying off young girls, supposed to bear reference to the tale of the daughters of the Lycian King, Pandarus, being carried away by harpies when left orphans. This tomb is of great antiquity, as its early style of sculpture indicates.

The tall column in the centre, with a sculptured pediment affixed to the wall, and the frieze round part of the room, are from an Ionic monument discovered by Sir C. Fellowes, and a very beautiful model of the temple restored, is among the objects in the Room. The mutilated figures on pedestals are also from the Ionic monument. There are many objects of great interest, and friezes on the walls, some of them being merely casts in plaster from sculptures which it was impossible to bring to England, and some of them are gay in red and blue, having backgrounds of those colours.

These precious relics of early art were all discovered by Sir Charles Fellowes, between the years 1838 and 1843, in a district of Asia Minor, till then unknown. In 1840, Sir C. Fellowes explored the long-lost cities of Lycia, some of which he had discovered in his former travels in 1838, and brought others to light; and, in 1841-43, Government lent its aid to the enthusiastic traveller, and the result is the important collection of marbles and casts which are now open to the public, in the Xanthian Room in the British Museum; and which we have the privilege of illustrating in our Journal.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

ENTHRONISATION OF THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

On Thursday the enthronisation of Dr. Musgrave took place in the Cathedral, at York, in the presence of many thousand spectators.

Shortly after ten o'clock the President took the chair, having at his right the [illegible] whilst the Chapter took their seats to the right and left. The Chapter were enclosed within a temporary barrier, covered with crimson cloth, outside of which stood the Clergy.

The Registrar having exhibited and read the letters mandatory directed to the Chapter for the enthronisation of the most Rev. Archbishop of York, the Clergy, &c., went in procession to the west door of the Cathedral, and then, having received his Grace, returned to the Chapter House, where the President took the chair, and his Grace was conducted to the seat at the head of the Chapter, on the President's right hand. The Clergy, &c., took their places, and then his Grace, in a clear and audible voice, read the petition which the Church formula contains for these solemn occasions.

The President accordingly decreed for the enthronisation as follows: "We, William Henry Dixon, Clerk, Master of Arts, President of this Chapter, by and with the consent of our brethren and canons now present, do decree the most Reverend Father in God, Thomas, by Divine Providence, Lord Archbishop of York, to be inducted, installed, and enthroned."

This having concluded the preliminary proceedings by the Chapter, the procession was again formed, and having reached the altar, the Archbishop was seated in a chair placed without the rails, and he shortly afterwards proceeded to penance as before, and then took the customary oath, which was administered by the Registrar, and the President invested the Archbishop with the pastoral staff and episcopal dignity in the prescribed terms.

The Archbishop and the President then proceeded to the episcopal throne, while they entered, the other members of the Chapter standing round. The Archbishop being seated, the President again declared him to be enthroned, in full possession of the privileges and jurisdiction of the Archbishopric and throne, and turning to the congregation, read a prayer, and the installation and enthronisation then concluded. The Archbishop remained sitting in the throne, and the canons having gone to their proper seats, the "Te Deum" was sung by the choir. The Archbishop then pronounced the blessing, with which the services concluded.

The members of the Chapter subsequently proceeded to the Chapter House, and there a demise of the manor of Bishopthorpe to the Archbishop was read, and sealed with the common seal.

DR. HAMPDEN.—We are informed, on good authority, that the inferences drawn by the Bishop of Oxford, in his published letter to the Bishop of Hereford (which, as to any alterations in a future edition of the "Bampton Lectures," or virtual withdrawal of the "Observations on Religious Dissent," are entirely groundless.

In reply to a requisition from certain members of his Clergy, Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, has published a series of "Statements and Reflections" on "The Hampden Controversy," in which his Grace strongly advocates the course which has been taken by the friends and supporters of Dr. Hampden.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Apprehension of invasion has crossed the Channel. In the year 1845 it was proposed by the French Government that a sum of 16,000,000f should be applied to the fortifying of Paris. The Débats now states that the correspondence on these fortifications had been greatly changed and augmented, and that the new defensive works resolved on would cost 64,195,700f., or about £2,568,000 sterling.

On Tuesday the Chamber of Peers voted five paragraphs of the Address, after a very animated discussion.

The Journal des Débats announces that the King had received from Queen Victoria a most affectionate letter of condolence on the occasion of the death of Princess Adelaide. Her Majesty had likewise written a letter on the same occasion to her uncle, the King of the Belgians.

A numerous meeting of the Free Trade Association was held on Friday in the Salle Montesquieu, under the Presidency of M. Antoson-Duperron, Peer of France. The President related all the events which had occurred relative to Free Trade both in France and abroad, and drew from them the conclusion that a general disposition exists to lower the tariffs. M. Joseph Garnier, M. Coquelin, and M. Bastiat then addressed the meeting.

Letters from Toulon, of the 5th inst., say that, while waiting for the decision of the Government, with that resignation which is the characteristic trait of the Mussulman, Abd-el-Kader lives tranquilly in the midst of his family, in the building of the lazaretto, which is seen by scarcely any one except the officers of the navy, whom the affairs of their service call to this establishment. However, at his request, and, doubtless, also for safety, very strict orders have been issued that no person shall, without leave, enter the Lazaretto, where a guard has been placed, composed of 30 grenadiers of the 3rd Regiment of Marines, commanded by an officer. The Emir, and persons of his suite, are now very comfortably settled, and are in want of nothing. They have never, most certainly, been so comfortably lodged.

SWITZERLAND

The result of the arrival in Paris of the Austrian and Prussian Commissioners empowered to treat of the affairs of Switzerland has been the adoption of another note by those diplomatists and by M. Guizot. This document purports to be a reply to the answer of the Swiss Diet, dated the 7th of December, and addressed to the Powers which had presented the first note identique of the 30th of November; but, as Great Britain and Russia had not caused their copies of the original note to be presented at Berne, and the answer was to have been written from this further correspondence, and this last despatch emanates exclusively from Austria, Prussia, and France. The whole tone of this paper is moderate.

The note begins by reserving to the Independent Sovereignty of the twenty-two Cantons, many of which were induced by the interference and recommendation of the great Powers only to give their assent to the Federal alliance. The neutrality of Switzerland and the independence of the Swiss territories were indications of the confidence then felt by the other Powers in the faithful maintenance of these fundamental conditions. These Powers, therefore, argue that their engagement as guarantees Switzerland as inseparably dependent on the engagement of the Swiss to one another. They acknowledge, at the same time, that as the Sonderbund has been dissolved, the Diet was justified in waving the formality of mediation; they assert the right of determining the principle of Cantonal Sovereignty, and to that principle alone, as the essential basis of the Confederation, the solicitude of these powers is directed. They, therefore, declare that, in their judgment, this Cantonal Independence cannot be said to exist as long as certain Cantons are in the military occupation of other Cantons, with all the circumstances resulting from such an occupation; that they and by stating that Switzerland will not be restored to her regular condition until all the Cantons have resumed the full and complete exercise of all their rights, upon which the fulfilment of the mutual engagements of the other Powers towards the Confederation is based.

Within the territory of Switzerland itself, things are going on badly, in consequence of the violence and injustice of the dominant party, who, having succeeded in their object of mediation; they assert the right of determining the principle of Cantonal Sovereignty, and to that principle alone, as the essential basis of the Confederation, the solicitude of these powers is directed. They, therefore, declare that, in their judgment, this Cantonal Independence cannot be said to exist as long as certain Cantons are in the military occupation of other Cantons, with all the circumstances resulting from such an occupation; that they and by stating that Switzerland will not be restored to her regular condition until all the Cantons have resumed the full and complete exercise of all their rights, upon which the fulfilment of the mutual engagements of the other Powers towards the Confederation is based.

Within the territory of Switzerland itself, things are going on badly, in consequence of the violence and injustice of the dominant party, who, having succeeded, on the 3rd of December last, in passing the Federal Pact, by a majority of 12 votes in the Diet, have proceeded, and still proceed, to the most arbitrary measures against the vanquished party. Under these distressing circumstances the following protest was signed:—

"The undersigned, regular canons of the Hospice of St. Bernard, in chapter assembled, legitimately represented by the Prior, against the occupation of their monastery by certain commissaries of the Government accompanied by 30 soldiers with fixed bayonets.

"They regard this invasion—

"1st. As a violation of an abode and an asylum open to all travellers.

"2d. As a serious insult to their religion and civil character.

"3d. As a violation of the rights of an establishment wholly devoted to the objects of beneficence for 850 years, constantly protected and supported by benefactors of all nations, by most of the Swiss Cantons, by ancient and modern Princes, who have all contributed to maintain the general hospitality of this house—of an establishment which Napoleon himself respected notwithstanding the laws of the Empire.

"They protest, in like manner against the inventory which these commissaries have taken of the property, moveable and immoveable of the Hospice; they regard this action as a check upon the exercise of that complete and free hospitality they have always exercised, and upon the property of the charitable. They regard the violent manner in which this inventory was taken as an act of persecution which nothing can justify or excuse. They regard it as a step towards the suppression and alienation of an establishment of beneficence, and they therefore formally demand that the troops which occupy it be withdrawn, and that the monastery be restored to its true destination, and to the exercise of the duties of religion and hospitality. This protest will be handed over to the commander of the picquet of occupation, to be by him transmitted to the proper authorities."

Signed by the Prior and 13 Monks of the Hospice of St. Bernard.

BELGIUM.

His Majesty returned on Monday night to Laeken from Paris. No slight excitement was occasioned in the afternoon in Brussels by the report that an individual had attempted to enter forcibly into the palace, and on being prevented, had fired on the portier. The facts are as follows:—A Pole, named Michael Krynkiewicz went to the chief entrance of the palace, and asked to be admitted to the King's presence. Having received the reply that his Majesty had not yet returned from Paris, he expressed a wish to see the interior of the palace. On being refused, he insisted on entering, and the portier was under the necessity of calling two soldiers on guard in front of the palace. Before they came up, however, Krynkiewicz drew out a pistol and fired at the portier, who immediately [illegible] without, however, receiving any injury. The culprit was immediately arrested, and conducted to the police office. On searching him the gendarmes found on his person a box containing percussion caps, a powder flask, a quantity of shot, an ivory whistle, and two pocket-books. It is supposed that he is insane, and that he has escaped from the Gheel, the well-known receptacle of madmen.

GERMAN STATES

HANOVER.—A Royal decree has been issued, by his Majesty King Ernest, announcing that a new code of laws will be instituted in his dominions on and after the 1st of May, 1848. The code will be applicable to all the provinces which, in many instances under the existing regulations, are subject to special laws of their own.

Letters from Frankfort of the 6th instant state that the Envoys of Denmark and of the Hanse Towns had certified to the Germanic Diet the refusal of their Governments to concur in coercive measures against Switzerland, or to participate in the proceedings of a conference to be held at Aarau for the like purpose, or elsewhere.

On the 7th the Germanic Diet resumed its sittings at Frankfort.

ITALY.

We noticed briefly in our Postscript of last week the important news of the Papal Dominions having just obtained from the enlightened Pontiff who at present sits in the chair of the Popes the greatest of all political advantages in the power of a sovereign to bestow, viz: a fully responsible and Constitutional Government. We now give somewhat more in detail the provisions of the motu proprio decree which his Holiness has issued on the subject, which relates to the organization of the Ministry, and which appears to have given universal satisfaction. The administration of the Holy See is, in future, to consist of nine departments, namely: foreign affairs, interior, public instruction, grace and justice, finance; commerce, fine-arts, manufactures, and agriculture; public works; war; and police. The chiefs of these departments are to compose the Council of Ministers. State affairs are not to be brought before that council until the Consulta (the deputies) shall have examined and given its opinion. Ministers are to be responsible for the acts of their respective administrations, and the subaltern officers are to be likewise accountable for the execution of the orders they may have received. The important affairs of the State are not to be submitted to the deliberations of the council until they shall have been discussed in the Council of Ministers. The latter are to appoint all public functionaries and officers, the consuls-general, the governors, and the councillors of the Government, the inspectors of the university and provincial colleges, the military commanders and officers, &c.; the Pope only reserves to himself the nomination of the cardinals, nuncios, &c. The Council of Ministers is to meet every week under the presidency of the Secretary of State. The latter is to be a cardinal, and his deputy a prelate; but the other Ministers may be indifferently [illegible] The Council of Ministers is to consist of twelve clergymen and twelve laymen, &c.

On the 27th, St. John's day, the feast of the Pope, a grand demonstration took place at night in his honour. Upwards of 30,000 persons proceeded, by the light of torches, to the Quirinal to salute the Pontiff. Pius IX. appeared at the balcony and bestowed his benediction on the multitude, which, afterwards quietly dispersed.

The difficulties which Pius IX. has to contend with from some illiberal ecclesiastics and laymen, in developing his wise and temperate system of reform in the Papal Government, may be understood from the following:—Previous to the last inst., notices had been circulated that the Pope had declined to receive the felicitations of the people as usual on New Year's Day, on the plea of indisposition; and the plea not being believed to be true, general discontent prevailed, the leaders of the people went to the Prince Corsini, the senator, and expressed to him their suspicion that the Retrogrades were again busy at their dark designs, and urged him to go personally and remonstrate with the Holy Father. The Prince went accordingly to the Quirinal Palace, where he was at first refused admittance, all being seemingly obstructed. He found the Secretary of State giving orders to take measures to prevent a revolution of which he was secretly apprised, and which was expected immediately to break out. The Prince, however, insisted, and at length forced his way to the presence of the Pontiff, whose indignation had no bounds when he heard of the notices which had been circulated. He asked why his people had not felicitated him as usual? Because, replied the Prince, they were told that your Holiness was indisposed, and could not receive them. Upon this his Holiness answered that everything which had been said upon that subject was utterly false, that he was not, and had not been, indisposed, and had not issued any such orders as those which had been reported. "And could they suppose," said his Holiness, "my people are prevented from coming to me, I will go to them." Accordingly, on the 2nd, the Holy Father went through the city, surrounded by an enthusiastic people, stopping before the gates of the Austrian and Neapolitan guards, and blessing the populace, and showing himself to be more popular, and, if possible, more beloved, than ever.

The conduct of the Neapolitan Sovereign presents a sad contrast to that of the Roman Pontiff. In Naples the people and the King are in a permanent attitude of attack and defence; and such is the political intolerance and oppression to which the former have been and are subjected, that the nobility have felt themselves obliged to join in the popular movement for reform, and all ranks are now banded together to force by revolution or otherwise a change for the better in the Government of the country. Several young nobles are in prison, among them Don Carlo di Santi Teodoro, a member of the richest and most important family in the city. The nobles have organised themselves into bands of ten, and on any one or more being taken, the first interrogation is, "Have you signed?" "Have you joined?" "Have you taken the oath?" "Are you accomplices?" "Yes," and he immediately denounces the rest of his band. This is reading the Government a very important lesson, since nearly every important family in Naples is ready to join in the "fun." The people publicly ask for three things: 1. Freedom of the press. 2. A personal freedom, such as is enjoyed by an Englishman. (This idea came from Sicily.)—3. An independent Parliament.

Our letters from Rome speak with confidence of a treaty agreement between the Governments of Rome, Tuscany, and Sardinia, to proceed coincidentally, though separately, in the abolition of the Ghetto and most important family in the city. Our letters from Rome speak with confidence of a treaty agreement between the Governments of Rome, Tuscany, and Sardinia, to proceed coincidentally, though separately, in the abolition of the Ghetto and most important family in the city. This understanding has for its object, not the suspension of reform, but to obviate discontent in any state which should have been surpassed by the other in its liberal views.

A sanguinary massacre has taken place at Milan, the capital of the Lombardo-Austrian dominions in Italy, apparently with the acquiescence, if not under the orders of the superior authorities. The number of the inhabitants killed and wounded by the soldiery is variously stated from thirty to one hundred and fifty. Among the killed is the aged custodian of the Casa Reyale, M. Mangenini, a man nearly seventy, and universally respected. He was murdered while peaceably and inoffensively entering his own house.

A letter, dated the 6th inst., furnishes the following details:—"The people of Milan, with a view to annoy the Government by diminishing the revenue, had resolved to discontinue the use of tobacco, the tax on which has hitherto yielded an enormous amount. Up to the first of the month, the pledge was rigidly observed, without any symptom of disturbance. Not a person was seen with either a pipe or a cigar, and hardly did a few old men venture to take a pinch of snuff. On the 1st inst., an Austrian captain and an American showed themselves in the streets smoking cigars. The captain received a blow on the cheek, and the American had [illegible] sands of cigars were sent to the barracks, with the following order of the day: 'Soldiers, you are to assist the Government in diminishing the revenue, and from now you have arms, make use of them.' On the 3rd, the garrison in bands of from 80 to 200 men, went through the streets and public promenades smoking cigars, and covering the populace with every species of insult, but attempted no violence to hiss the soldiery. The latter, heated with wine, fell upon the people; the [illegible] commenced at six in the evening, and lasted till midnight. A hundred and fifty wounded persons were taken to the hospital, and others were attended at their homes. The number of killed is not known. Among them is M. Mangenini, a counsellor of the Court of Appeal, a man 60 years of age, and highly esteemed. The police chief, Count Cenzi, who was in his coach, was arrested. The people breathing vengeance are arming with every available weapon. The lottery is about to share the fate of the tobacco duty. On the 3d, it was agreed that every person who put into the lottery shall be dismissed from his place, if he be a servant or workman, and if in an independent position, then he shall be treated with public contempt."

SPAIN.

The debate respecting M. Salamanca was suspended on the 8th inst., in consideration of the indisposition of the accused; but the Chamber finally decided, by a majority of 188 to 33, that he should be brought to trial. This was contrary to the wishes of the Court.

General Espartero had arrived at Madrid before the 7th.

THE UNITED STATES

The packet ship Liverpool arrived on Tuesday in the Mersey, with dates from New York to the 23rd ult. The Liverpool brings £1,000 in specie.

In Congress, a series of resolutions from the Legislature of New York in favour of the formation of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific, has been received by the House of Representatives, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

A correspondence has taken place between the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs and the American Minister at that Court, relative to the Repeal of the Navigation Laws of Great Britain. Mr. Bancroft applied to Viscount Palmerston early in November, to learn whether Ministers would consent to establish with the United States a perfect system of reciprocity, in making all vessels of either country, bringing cargoes from any part in the world, free to trade to any port of the other nation, whether home or colonial. Viscount Palmerston, after the lapse of some weeks, replied that, although her Majesty's Ministers did not feel at liberty to advise her Majesty at once to make such a change in the commercial system as was asked by Mr. Bancroft, without the sanction of Parliament, yet as soon as that body would meet, a measure would be introduced which would embrace all the views put forth by Mr. Bancroft in his note.

MEXICO.

Santa Anna again seems likely to take a prominent position. He is stated to be at the head of a small body of Mexican troops, and ready to start from Tehuacan to call in the Congress of Queretaro, where the army has deserted the Government, and declared in his favour. Another revolution is consequently anticipated in the overthrow of the pacific President Anaya. Santa Anna breathing out revenge and bloodshed to the Americans is fearfully to ever.

Reinforcements continued to arrive with General Scott's detachment, he has from 25,000 to 30,000 men under him at present. Generals Worth, Pillow, and Duncan have been arrested, in consequence of a remarks reflecting in an improper manner on the General-in-Chief of the Army, General Scott.

President Anaya delivered an inaugural address to the Mexican Deputies, on being sworn into office.

A SPANISH NEWSPAPER.—A newspaper in Spain is too often the speculation of a literary hack, who, unable to find employment for his talents, or promote their own political and personal views, in which special line they embark equally without money or without character. There is nothing disreputable in a tradesman turning journalist, but the case is far different with the literary adventurer. The tradesman pays down the price of his establishment; but for promises or princes of the blood like the father of the present King, Don Francisco di Paula to embark in a newspaper speculation and be found wanting on the day of fulfilment, was not enough. The greatest literary labour, of type, paper, pens and ink, and paragraph and leading-article material. It follows that able political writers are not encouraged, for they cannot be paid, and hence the indifferent writing of the journals. A great many compilations are sent in reports by political men who desire to send their political opinions or to serve their party. The writers by profession have badly paid, and they make up an [illegible] by [illegible] a night. Men of talent who are not fond of writing, or not well weighing a subject, when they are not adequately paid for their pains. Declamation is so easy, and the Spanish language so gracefully and sonorously adapted for flowery and florid declamation, that a remarkable effect of volume is spun out full of sound, but signifying nothing. If Spanish newspaper establishments were prepared to pay as proprietors and editors pay their writers in Frederland and France, we do not doubt but they would get as many critiques can be procured in London and Paris, but we do say they might find sensible and instructed men, like Conde, the author of the "Historia de la Dominacion de los Arabes en Espana," and Martinez de la Rosa, the author of the "History of the Spanish Revolution," written during his exile, and published at Paris in 1813; like Quintana, author of "Vidas de Espanoles Celebres;" like de Lara, author of "Espana desde Fernando VII. hasta Mendizabal;" like Caballero; like old Burgos, the excellent and trustworthy editor of Horace, or like old Martinez de la Rosa, who, though somewhat too jaded and flowery, ruined and broken down, is yet as the vase of Moore—

"Some time the richest perfume keeps,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

But no; there is an indolence and a stagnation among proprietors [illegible] which are extraordinary. All the feuilletons are translated at second [illegible] the French, and some of the most indifferent are translated. Occasionally, of the papers, there are humorous articles and pasquinades. The [illegible] art is tolerably well known at Madrid, and is brought to play an important part in the Spanish journals during the sitting of the Congress and Senate. The reporters of the Spanish press are a very hilarious, hirsute, filthy-looking race, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—On Tuesday the half-yearly meeting of this society was held at their offices, 3, Trafalgar-square, B. B. Cabbell, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The reports of the previous monthly meetings having been read and confirmed, the Duke of Norfolk was elected as President of the society; Mr. B. Hawes, as treasurer; and Mr. Charlier, as secretary. From the report of the operations of the society for the year just ended, it appears that the total number of cases relieved during the year 1847 were 130; each case comprising one or more individuals; and of these all were successfully treated, except nine, who were beyond recovery. There were also rewarded with medals, 10 of which were referred to the general court. During the past year the society had presented 21 silver pocketpiece, thanks to four persons on vellum—thanks to six upon paper, and 111 pecuniary rewards. The receipts derived from subscriptions, donations, sermons, &c., was £2573 16s.; from legacies, £101 15s. 5d.; making £2676 11s. 5d. The expenses were, for the general purposes of the society, £2080 2s. 6d.; for the new account at Sinker's, £12 14s. 9d. Paying-houses and conveyances in the office, £351 7s. 6d. Balance, £232 9s. 2d. Making a total of £2676 11s. 5d.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday afternoon a meeting of the Governors and Committee of the above hospital was held at the institution in West Strand, for the transaction of general business. Dr. Bowers, the Dean of Manchester, in the chair. The report for the year just ended stated that 12,602 indigent sick had, during the year, been admitted on the books for relief, at a cost of £22½ 4s. 11d.; of which number 1150 were in, and 10,937 were outpatients, making a total of 933,708 individuals who have partaken of the charitable funds of the institution, from its commencement in 1818. The funds are at present in a very low state, and inadequate to the demands made upon the charity.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—This Society held its monthly meeting on Wednesday evening, Mr. Commissioner Fane in the chair. A paper by Wm. Sharpe, Esq., a member, "On the present state of Courts for the Recovery of Small Debts," was then read before the society, and discussed. The writer contended that the popularity of the measure was already so much on the wane, that, unless radical improvements were made in it, the Legislature would cease to be resorted to. He urged, however, that the general tendency being to resort, where at all possible, to the higher and more competent Courts of the country, for which Courts a greater respect is entertained, and to which a large Legislature, while it afforded all reasonable opportunities of resorting to local judges, to endeavour to bring the superior tribunals within the reach of all, rather than hypothitatory enactments to compel a more general resort to inferior and therefore unsatisfactory tribunals. Mr. Cheere, in controverting the statement that the County Court system was becoming unpopular, mentioned the fact that the number of cases brought before the Clerkenwell County Court, with which he was connected, had been, in nine months, no fewer than 11,949; while those brought before the Westminster Court in the same period had numbered nearly 13,000. The total number of orders issued by the County Courts had amounted to 7453; the fees paid to the officers of the Court on which had averaged not more than 7s. 6d. per case, the average amount recovered having been £3 3s. A proof that these Courts were not less resorted to than formerly considered that there were amendments which might most beneficially be introduced into it, and, at the same time, that much might be done in the way of facilitating access to the superior Courts. The resolution, after a short discussion, was adopted, and the meeting separated

COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.—The Commissioners of the Metropolitan sewers under the late Act met on Thursday morning in Committee-room No. 8, in the Cloisters, Lord Morpeth in the chair. Applications were received from Mr. Abraham, on behalf of the proprietors of Victoria-street, and from Mr. Grant, on behalf of the Metropolitan Sewerage Manure Company, both of which applications were referred to Mr Austen, to report thereon in a fortnight. Lord Morpeth announced to the Committee that the Government had determined to employ the expense of an Ordnance Survey of London, to be executed on a scale of five feet to a mile, and the total cost was estimated at £36,392. This map will be on a considerably larger scale than any of the Ordnance maps hitherto executed The noble Lord stated that a vote would be taken in Committee of Supply for this expense The Committee adjourned to the 27th inst

DISSECTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—The first meeting of the session was held on Tuesday evening, Sir John Rennie, President, in the chair, when a paper was read, descriptive of Mr Frederick Ransome's process for making artificial stone The modus operandi appeared to be the formation of a siliceous paste (composed of flint) being subjected for a time to the action of caustic alkali, boiling under pressure in a close vessel, formed a transparent silicated solution, which was evaporated to a specific gravity of 1300 (distilled water being 1000), and was then intimately mixed with given proportions of well washed sand, broken granite, and other materials of different degrees of hardness. The paste thus constituted, after being pressed into moulds, drawn into wires, or otherwise formed were received, was subjected to a red heat in a stove or kiln, by which operation all the free or uncombined silica of the raw materials united with the excess of alkali existing in the solution, forming a silicate more completely insoluble than the compound from which it was derived, and rendering the artificial stone perfectly insoluble. This production must evidently be adaptable to a comprehensive range of objects for decorative art and architectural purposes bricks, pipes, tubing, tiles, roofing slates, chimney-pots, cornices, vases, busts, bases of columns, &c. Even grinding-stones and whetstones for scythes have been made of it; and, in fact, from the beauty and variety of the specimens exhibited, there would appear to be a vast field opened for such a production. It was stated to be already extensively manufactured at Ipswich; and it was allowed to admit of extensive application where elaborately carved stone would be too expensive. It was announced that the annual general meeting for the election of President, Council, and officers of the Institution would be held on Tuesday, Jan. 18

STATIONERS' HALL.—On Tuesday the Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants of this ancient and influential company, gave a dinner to a numerous party at their hall, at which were present the Lord Mayor, several Aldermen, some gentlemen connected at the bar, and others distinguished in the walks of literature, science, and the fine arts. Sir Wm. Magnay, Bart., the present Master, was in the chair

VICARAGE OF CAMBERWELL.—The advowson of the vicarage of Camberwell, and the right of presentation, subject to the life of the present incumbent, who is forty-four years of age, were offered for sale by auction yesterday at the Mart. The particulars stated the gross income of the vicarage to be £2244 16s. 11d., from the tithe rent charge, ground rents, surplice fees, and Easter offerings, from which the outgoings were £140 11s. There was a full attendance, and a good deal of discussion took place upon the terms of the sale and other points. The first offer was £10,000, the highest £12,600 The reserve was £12,700, and that amount not being bid, the sale was not effected

INSTITUTION OF THE ARTS.—The Society of Arts is now exhibiting, at their rooms in the Adelphi, a large and interesting collection of specimens in every branch of lithography, for the purpose of illustrating the progress of lithographic art in England. The walls of the rooms are covered with the most highly-finished and expensive works when modern skill has been able to produce; and, as the series not only illustrates the advance of late years made in the effects and finish of stone-engraving, but exhibits at the same time the gradual development of a chromatic drawing until it reaches the gorgeous perfection seen in Owen Jones's "Alhambra," and other illuminated works, it is equally attractive to the professional artist and to the amateur Indeed, every kind of lithography from the simple drawing on stone with crayon, to the complicated process of printing tints and colours upon gold and silver, is abundantly illustrated by the richest and most highly-finished specimens the first houses in London have been able to supply. It is expected that, by giving encouragement to this favourite branch of art, it will further improve to such a point that it will eventually be made available for many purposes of illustration where steel or copper are now used. Tickets of admission may be obtained at the shops of the principal print-sellers in London

AMENDMENT OF THE BUILDINGS ACT The private Committee appointed by Lord Morpeth to consider in defects of the present Act, and to suggest remedies, met on Wednesday last in Lord Morpeth's room at the Home Office (what we have always urged must be done) the preparation of an entirely new Act, rather than any patchin of the old one Whether or not the Government will act upon this advice, of course remains to be seen Builder.

ALTERATION IN THE RIVER STEAM SERVICE.—For some time the ten steam packets between London Bridge and Chelsea have been running at a penny fare for the whole distance, whilst the Citizen Company have been charging their usual fare, twopence. An amalgamation has now taken place between them, and on Monday morning they commenced running at twopence to London and threepence to Chelsea, their boats calling alternately at the various piers

"CLEAN HANDS." A correspondent of the Mechanics' Magazine, referring to the habits of the workmen in the employment of Messrs. Boulton and Co., of the City-road, states that the refreshing and healthy custom of washing by the workmen, enables their employers to realise about £400 annually by the sale of the deposit of gold and silver remaining in the water-tanks after the men have performed their daily ablutions

HORRIBLE OCCURRENCE.—On Tuesday morning, about a quarter before nine o'clock, smoke was observed pouring forth from one of the vaults used for burying the dead at St. Saviour's Church, London-bridge. Engines were soon upon the spot. The moment the door of the vault was opened, the effluvium that arose nearly knocked the firemen down. After considerable trouble the flames were extinguished, when a scene presented itself of a most horrible nature. A number of coffins were found to be so extensively burnt that the bodies had fallen out and were consuming. There were some had their hands burned off, whilst others were so charred that it would be impossible to identify them. Respecting the origin of the disaster nothing is precisely known, from the fact of a body having been interred the previous afternoon, it is believed that from a lighted candle during the funeral might have fallen amongst the coffins, and hence the calamity

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—According to the Registrar-General's report, the deaths registered in the metropolitan districts in the week ending last Saturday were 1364. The weekly average for the winter quarter, corrected for increase of population, is 1107; whence it appears that last week's mortality is in excess of the average by 257. The abstract of causes of death shows that this excess is principally due to epidemics, of which influenza, typhus, scarlet fever, and measles are the most prevalent. To influenza, though this disease is steadily on the decline, there are yet 103 deaths ascribed. The unusual prevalence of fever in the metropolis is shown by the fact that during the last thirteen weeks, it has been fatal to 1206 persons, whereas in the early part of last year, and generally in former years, only about one-third of this number died during the same length of time. The following table of deaths from purpure, or no kindred scurvy, exhibits a remarkable increase throughout the whole of 1847 of this comparatively rare complaint, incidental to persons of a debilitated habit

EXECUTION OF SALE. The unfortunate man Sale, who was condemned at the December sittings of the Central Criminal Court, for the murder of Mr. Bell of chambers, suffered the extreme punishment of the law, on Monday, at St. Mary's Hall, Coventry, by his political supporters, in testimony of their respect for the hon. gentleman's character

SCIENCE REWARDED BY THE EXCISE. We understand that the distinguished discoverer of the effects of chloroform, to obviate the difficulty experienced by his brethren of the faculty in London in procuring the articles in a state of purity, has been obliged to forward a sample made by him to the Excise Commissioners of Messrs. Duncan and Flockhart, of this town, when, lo! it was seized by the Excise upon the border. Chloroform, of course, does not contain one particle of spirits, but it is quite possible that spirits is employed in its preparation, although it is just as possible, we believe, to prepare it without. This little accident is like to show us that we have hardly yet got beyond the verge of the Inquisition. Is ben Galilee's astronomy was forced to bow to the dogmas of the Inquisition. It is quite wonderful what the vigilance of excisemen will prompt them sometimes to seize. We have heard of a late instance on the border of the sequestration of coffee, and all, because a few drops of spirits had been used preservative This, however, might be the means of saving the last scruples of a pledged teetotaler

REDUCTION OF WAGES. Friday last, notices were posted in all the mills of Blackburn, applying the hands that their wages would be reduced (generally 10 per cent.) at the expiration of a month after date. In a few instances the reduction will be 10 per cent. on the spinners' and weavers' wages, and 7½ per cent. on the wages of the card-room hands: but, in the majority of instances, it will be uniform. Sir W. Feilden and Sons' mill started on Monday last, after a cessation of about three months.

THE SUBWAY UNION.—On Tuesday night the demolition of the windows of this ill-fated nation-house, by the refractory paupers, commenced soon after the bricks from one of the chimneys, pulled down for the occasion, furnished materials, and were soon hurled through the glass, carrying, at each concussion, portions of the frame along with them. The assistance of the Parish constables was procured, and order speedily restored. One or two of the ringleaders were placed in the refractory ward, which was soon broken down, and they were ultimately taken before the Mayor, and committed to prison, in default of security to keep the peace towards Mr. Daly, the schoolmaster, and an inmate of the "house," named Fuller, who had given the necessary information for their apprehension, and whose safety was endangered by the threats of violence used towards them. On the person of one of the prisoners, named Bryant, a formidable weapon, in the shape of a crow-bar (which had formed the leg of an iron bedstead), was found concealed. Other instances have also been exhibited against two or three others.

ALLEGED MEDICAL NEGLECT The inquiry touching the death of Elizabeth Hopkins, alias Howard, whose death was alleged to have been occasioned by the neglect of Dr Berneastle, one of the medics officers of the Croydon Union, was resumed on Tuesday, at the Gun, Croydon. After a long inquiry, the Jury returned the following verdict:—That Elizabeth Hopkins, alias Howard, died from exhaustion, resulting upon protracted labour; and that Dr. Bernecastle has shown the greatest humanity towards the deceased, in having her seen in the night; and that it is the duty of the Jury, therefore, to give a very unfit person to act as a medical officer."

DARING BURGLARY AND ROBBERY AT VISCOUNT FOLKSTONE'S RESIDENCE. On one and half-past ten on Sunday night, while the servants of Viscount Folkstone, of Longford Castle (a few miles from Salisbury), had gone to the hall, for supper, &c., some daring thieves broke open the iron railing of the entrance to the man and stable servants, over the coach-house, and stole a small mahogany box, containing £42 in gold, thirty private letters, and other valuables; also a black dress coat and other articles of dress, the property of the coachman. They were also taken five sovereigns, a great coat, &c., belonging to the groom; and a silver watch belonging to one of the stablemen. The thieves have not been discovered

ALFRED BUCHANAN, the gentleman shoplifter, who was found guilty at the last Sessions, for stealing a purse and scent bottle, of the value of 6s., the property of Frederick James Hamper, was brought up on Monday for judgment. The Recorder (Mr. Jardine) sentenced him to three months imprisonment, with hard labour

PATRICK REID, who was recently found guilty of the triple murder at Mirfield, was executed on Saturday last, at York, in presence of a vast congregation He made a full confession of his frightful crime

A CABINET Council was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The Ministers present were—Lord John Russell, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Campbell, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, and the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay The Council sat three hours

A SKETCH.—The following vigorous and graphic sketch of Lord Brougham is given by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, in one of a series of letters addressed by him to Lord Stanley on the subject of his Lordship's speech in the House of Lords, the 23rd of November last, on the alleged denunciations from the altar by the priesthood in Ireland:—"Never did a Stanley occupy a more discreditable position than you did on that memorable occasion. Your bottleholders in the calumnious onslaught you are said to have made upon us, were anything but reputable accessories for one of your nature to be sustained by the one a mushroom Lord, with a name as dissonant as his heart is discordant with every upright feeling and every generous sentiment the mercenary of party and of principle—the captain-errant of every wind, veering with every wind, uncertain in nothing but his instability the regular "fata morgana" of this moment grave and serious, the next fantastic and grotesque the ridiculous harlequin, then the mystic philosopher, the perfect Proteus in the suddenness of his transformations—one while a seditious Gracchus, the outrageous abettor of licentiousness—again, a wicked Caligula, aiming for an occasion to strike down with one blow every rational liberty. He has, it is true, momentary convulsions which those at a distance are wont to mistake for the brilliant reflections of the gems of honour and truth, but which those who know him well, and happen to be near his person, have always understood to be nothing more than the transient glare of a brimstone heart on fire, or the pestilent light of incurable corruption. Dressed out in the full panoply of literature, he has been the constant oil cans of Fernley, without his genius, he apes his impiety. * * * * * * The patriot Swift would seem to have had his image before his mind when describing his infamous perjurer, Lord Wharton. "His behaviour is in all the forms, but none of its." Whether he walks, or whistles, or swears, or takes brandy, or calls names, he acquits himself in each beyond a Templar of three years' standing. Although of graver heads think too profane and scandalous, they dare not be ashamed of him, for he is very useful in Parliament, being a ready speaker, and content to employ his gift upon such occasions where those who conceive they have any remains of reputation or decency are ashamed to appear. Indifferent to the applause of the good, he is insensible to the reproach of any. His is worst the sense of shame or glory, as some are without the sense of smelling Therefore, a good name to him is no more than a precious ointment lost to these

CHRISTMAS FARE BY RAILWAY. From the 18th to the 24th of December last, a period of six days only, there arrived from the agricultural districts of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Herts, and Cambridgeshire, and the Eastern Counties Railway, 1647 sacks of flour, 11,546 sacks of malt, 3198 sacks of wheat, 3414 sacks of barley, 1374 sacks of oats, and 1003 sacks of seeds, 333 tons of potatoes, 193 tons of fish, 94 tons of poultry and game, 133 tons of beer, 5594 sheep, 545 oxen, 181 pigs, 10,600 quarts of milk, 2400 loaves of bread, and 480 tons of coal. During the same period 17,029 persons by passenger trains alone came to town, of which 6000 were turkeys for Christmas cheer

DISINFECTING FLUIDS The question of disinfectants the wards of fever Hospitals by different metallic compounds, which have of late been puffed into a most undeserved notoriety by Parliamentary and other documents, has received a fearful solution in the death from fever of one of the most active experimentalists, Daniel Calvert. This gentleman, who, unfortunately for himself, supposed that the poison of fever was as easily decomposed by a solution of nitrate of lead as sulphuretted hydrogen, and who had been officially sent to Canada, in company with M. Ledoyen, to test the efficacy of this liquid in destroying infection, has fallen a victim to his excess of zeal. M. Ledoyen has suffered himself from an attack of typhus, and is now on his way home to England. By report of the results of this mission is required, the fact that both commissioners were attacked with fever, and that one died from the effects of a febrile poison, which a disciple into a solution of nitrate of lead was utterly unable to destroy, is a sufficient proof of the futility of all such schemes

RELATIVE MORTALITY FROM CHOLERA IN PARIS AND LONDON.—The mortality from cholera in Paris during the epidemic of 1832 was 6000 in a population of nearly two millions of persons. The causes of the great disparity are most probably to be found in the free circulation of air, the more spacious streets, better supply of water, greater cleanliness, and more perfect drainage in London than in Paris. It would be difficult to find a stronger or more convincing argument for the general adoption of every sanitary preventive measure, than this important fact.

SPECIAL COMMISSION IN LIMERICK

CAPITAL CONVICTION.—Andrew Dea, aged about 17 was on Friday found guilty of the wilful murder of Edmund Murphy, at Clonkeh-Roche, on the 9th June, 1847.—Sentence to be executed on the 7th of February next

Bryan Ryan was charged with having, with others unknown, appeared in arms, and forcibly entered the house of a person named Noonan, in the month of November last, with intent to rob the said Noonan of his moneys. There were several counts in the indictment, varying the charge in form, to all of which the prisoner pleaded guilty. Sentence—Transportation for life

DEMANDING ARMS Patrick Farrell and John Farrell were indicted for breaking into the dwelling-house of Patrick Barkman, at Tonagh, on the 11th November last, and for having then and there, with others, assaulted the said Barkman and demanded his arms. Several witnesses having been examined, the Jury retired (for the first time since the opening of the commission), and, after a deliberation of nearly two hours, intimated that there was some doubt entertained as to the identity of one of the prisoners, though they were perfectly clear as to the guilt of the other. They were sent to reconsider their verdict. The Jury were eleven to one for conviction of the two Farrells. Medical testimony was given to the Court of the illness of one of the Highlanders. The Attorney-General consented to receive the verdict against one (no entry being made on the issue paper regarding the other) The sick man was not the recusant one

On Monday, the Lord Chief Justice passed sentence on the various persons convicted of attacking dwelling-houses, &c. The convictions were upwards of [illegible] number; and the nature of the punishments awarded was transportation, and imprisonment for different periods of time. The convicts condemned to transportation were immediately removed from court, placed in irons, and taken away on cars en route for Dublin, escorted by a large force of the Queen's Bays and 47th Regiment Highlanders. There were upwards of 20 convicts in the batch.

THIRD CAPITAL CONVICTION. Thomas Renahan, a well-looking young man, about 20 years of age, was found guilty of the wilful murder of John M'Elroy on the 5th of October, 1847. Sentence was passed on the 14th of February next

The Court on Tuesday adjourned to Wednesday, the 19th inst.

It has been decided that a Commission is to be held for the South Riding of Tipperary, to will be opened at Clonmel on Monday, the 24th inst.; whether it will be extended to the North Riding is yet doubtful

An extraordinary Gazette was issued on Tuesday morning, containing proclamations against upon all persons (save and except certain reservations) residing within the lately proclaimed districts in the counties of Cavan and Galway, to deposit their arms within an allotted time at certain depots, under the penalty of two years' imprisonment, with hard labour, as prescribed by the provisions of the Prevention of Crime Act.

NEWTOWNBARRY.—From the Special Commission, reports are still rife of the commission of violent outrages in different parts of the county

ILL LATE ON "SPAIN OR HONOUR" AT COBH.—A case of criminal prosecution, for an assault committed by Mr. Robert Hardy, of Cork, upon Captain G. Bunbury, of the 67th Regiment, lately stationed there, was tried on Friday, before the Recorder of that city. The proceeding arose out of circumstances connected with the interruption of an engagement subsisting between the prosecutor and a young lady, the sister of the accused. Captain Bunbury was expelled, and stated that, upon his representing the consequences, to the happiness of both, that would ensue from a marriage under the circumstances, in which the threatened displeasure of his father, with his own want of fortune, would place them, the lady herself, at an interview, released him from all previous engagements. If she had not, he declared that he was determined to fulfil his promise of marriage at any risk. As to the reason for Captain Bunbury's not retaliating upon his assailant, his Counsel observed, it was evident from the physical strength of each of the parties, that, had not Captain Bunbury been actuated by a spirit of forbearance, he might have raised Mr Hardy and dropped him over the side of the vessel on board of which the assault was committed. The Jury found a verdict of "Guilty." The sentence was postponed to allow affidavits to be put in in mitigation of the offence. Meanwhile, the traverser, who stated that he had not yet attained his majority, entered into a recognizance to come up for judgment

THE O'CONNELLS INVITED TO FRANCE.—The following invitation of the family of Mr. O'Connell to France was read, on Monday, at the Repeal Association. Mr. John O'Connell, in the name of the family, accepted it:—"Committee of the Defence of Religious Liberty, Paris, Jan. 5, 1848. Sir, I am charged by the Committee over which I preside to submit to you, in the name of the friends of Catholic liberty, the following proposition:—On Thursday, the 20th of February, the funeral oration of your immortal father will be delivered in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, in the presence of his Grace the Archbishop, by the first orator of France, and perhaps of the Church, the Rev Father Lacordaire. The friends of the French Catholics, on Sunday, the 13th, or Monday, the 14th of February, or any other day it may be more convenient to you to name. In consenting to grant us this favour, you will contribute, Sir, to draw closer those ties already so ancient and honourable which unite the Irish and French nations, and which we proudly rejoice, since the example of your in comparable father has taught us how to combat for God and for freedom, Emancipate, Sir, and that you will receive with the assurance of the very high consideration with which I have the honour to be, your very humble and obedient servant, THE COUNT DE MONTALEMBERT, Peer of France.—To John O'Connell, M.P."

FUNERAL OF MADAME ADELAIDE.

The funeral obsequies of the late Madame Adelaide took place at Dreux, near Paris, on Wednesday (last week). We subjoin the details:

The precise hour at which the funeral cortège of the illustrious deceased Madame Adelaide would reach Dreux was not exactly known, but as early as half-past ten o'clock every preparation was made for its reception. By that hour detachments of the National Guards, and of a regiment of infantry, together with a squadron of cuirassiers, the last headed by their band, took up their position at the barrier leading to the town, by which the procession was to enter. The troops were presently joined by the military and civil authorities of the department in uniform; by the Judges, Officers, and Advocates of the Tribunal of Dreux, in their robes; by several municipal persons, and by many of the principal inhabitants of the town and vicinity. Shortly after a numerous body of the clergy, clothed in surplices, and bearing wax tapers, to which were attached silver escutcheons, with the initials "M. A. O." in letters of gold, went in procession from the Royal residence, accompanied by a large train of singing boys and choristers. The clerical procession was wound up by three trophies in their respective stations.

On both sides of the streets through which the cortège had to pass, crowds of people were assembled from an early hour, and all appeared to feel deep regret at the event which had befallen the Royal Family and the nation. The better classes, both male and female, were all clothed in deep mourning; and even the poor country folk wore what mourning they had, or at least appeared with black ribbons or bits of crape. From the windows of a great many shops, both, and private houses, in the line of the procession, tri-color flags were displayed, with streamers in black crape; and similar marks of respect were profusely exhibited on the barriers of the town.

Shortly after twelve o'clock the mournful cortège entered Dreux, the hearse being followed by their Royal Highnesses the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duke de Montpensier. In the course of a few minutes the troops, officials, magistrates, and clergy, formed themselves into procession, and proceeded through the town to the Royal burial-place. The bells of the Royal chapel and of the town churches tolled mournfully as the funeral cortège wended its way, with "solemn step and slow," to its destination. The crowds through which it passed regarded it with reverential sympathy, and without any of the vulgar curiosity which is too often exhibited on such melancholy occasions.

The following was the order of the procession:—Cuirassiers and gendarmes, a military band, detachments of cavalry and infantry, the latter with arms reversed; a detachment of national guards, muffled drums, the clergy chanting mournful psalms. Then came the hearse drawn by eight horses, the latter with large black mantles and plumes, the hearse being so constructed as to allow a sight of the interior. Priests were engaged in prayer at each side of the coffin, which was covered with a large pall, on which were inscribed the initials of the Royal deceased. The three Princes followed the hearse on foot through the town to the Chapel. The Dukes de Nemours and Montpensier were the ushers of Generals in the army, and the Prince de Joinville that of an Admiral in a ship were uncovered, and had on large blue cloaks. They were followed by the officers of their respective suites, and by several general and other officers, all of them being in full uniform and uncovered. The procession was wound up by another detachments of infantry and cavalry

The preparations made in the Royal Chapel were of a remarkably simple character. The pl[illegible] near the principal altar were merely covered with black velvet, ornamented with silver; and the floor of the chapel was also entirely covered with plain black cloth. The walls were not covered. In the centre of the Chapel, facing the great altar, was a catafalque, of simple, yet elegant construction. It was of black velvet, with decorations in silver, and the initials, "A. O.," were inscribed on different parts of it. At the top was the coronet of a Royal Princess, from which hung a veil of black crape The whole was surrounded by a canopy of Royal velvet and gruine, and surrounded by a multitude of wax-lights. Facing the altar, chairs and cushions were placed for the Royal Family. The outside of the Chapel had no decorations at all, unless two black hangings on each side of the entrance, with the Princess' initials on them can be called so

When the procession was within about a hundred yards of the Chapel, the Queen, the Queen of the Belgians (who only arrived at Dreux a few hours before), the Duchess d'Orleans, the Duchess de Nemours, and the Duchess of Saxe-

Coburg Gotha (Princess Clementine) entered the Chapel. They were all habited in the deepest mourning, with long black veils. It was remarked that the Queen appeared as if she had been weeping

A few minutes after, the hearse arrived within a short distance of the Chapel The King, who had been waiting in the vestibule of the residence, then advanced towards it, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe-Cobur. and when the coffin was removed, preceded it into the Chapel, the Princes leaning him. His Majesty was in a plain black suit, with a black paletôt. The King appeared in good health, notwithstanding the bitter sorrow which he has felt, and still feels, at the loss of his beloved sister. His Majesty, though he must have suffered acutely, was enabled to maintain perfect calm

The King, Queen, Princes, and Princesses having taken their places in the front of the altar, and their respective suites, the different officials and other persons, having occupied the body of the Chapel and the reserved seats, the solemn service for the dead commenced. The Archbishop of Paris, and the Bishops of Eyreux, Versailles, and Metz took part in different portions of the service, which was throughout of that thrilling, affecting, and awe-inspiring character for which the Catholic Church has endeavoured to make it remarkable. The Royal party seemed borne down by affliction, and it was observed that the King scarcely removed his eyes from his prayer-book during the whole time

After a considerable portion of the religious ceremony had been gone through, the body was removed to the vaults beneath the chapel. The King, the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Duke de Montpensier, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha followed it with every outward mark of the most profound respect; and they were accompanied by most of the eminent personages of their suites from the body of the Chapel. The Queen and the Princesses remained in prayer before the altar. When in the vault, the remaining prayers of the Church were said over the body, the usual psalms were chanted, and the ceremony of casting earth on the coffin, and sprinkling it with holy water was gone through When the earth was thrown on the coffin, the King appeared to feel great emotion, but succeeded in quickly recovering himself. His Majesty then bent over the coffin, and with great solemnity kissed it.

On the return from the vaults of the King and the Princes, who were accompanied by the clergy, some more prayers were said, and the mournful ceremony was then brought to a close, after having occupied about two hours.

On leaving the Chapel, the King bowed repeatedly to the persons present, all of whom formed a passage for him and the Royal party.

The vault in which the remains of her Royal Highness Madame Adelaide have been placed is near to that of the late Duke d'Orleans. It was set apart for her Royal Highness some time ago by the King. His Majesty, as may, perhaps, be known, has also caused the vaults of himself, the Queen, and other members of the Royal Family, to be constructed.

At half-past four o'clock the King, Queen, and Royal Family left Dreux, on their return to Paris. Their Majesties were loudly cheered by the people as they passed through the town.

The Royal suite comprised General de Rumigny, General Arnyard, Baron Fain, Count Montalembert, the Duke de Montmorency, and several other distinguished persons. In addition to the peoples named above, the Bishop of Chartres was present, but was unable to take any part in the ceremony, owing to indisposition.

members of the Royal Family. This took place during the Carnival of 1836, when, the marriage of the Duke of Orleans having been arranged, the youthful members of the family assembled for the last time as bachelors together at the Tuileries—and it was resolved among the younger Dukes to give their elder brother a charivari, by way of farewell to the jolly bachelor's life he had hitherto been leading. Accordingly, on the night of Shrove Tuesday, the merry band, with the Prince de Joinville at its head, all masked, attired in the fantastic costume of Molière's apothecaries, and mounted on little ponies trained for the occasion, suddenly burst into the apartment where the Duke of Orleans, with the Queen, Madame Adelaide, and the other members of the Royal Family were quietly waiting the surprise, though little dreaming of its nature, and galloped over the polished floor with loud clatter and discordant cries; at the same time, amid roars of laughter, charging the young Duke with such weapons as they bore—weapons peculiar to their profession, a joke unmentionable in England, but vastly relished by the population of Paris during the Carnival time. The jest was quite in the style of the days of the Court of Marie Antoinette, and, as a souvenir of the youth of Louis Philippe and his sister, enjoyed by them exceedingly; but, however, like all other rough jokes, it ended ill for the perpetrators. The Prince de Joinville, who was considered to have been its inventor, met with a severe reprimand from high authority, and a request to absent himself for a while from the Tuileries. Madame Adelaide, whose godson and favourite was thus selected for punishment, ventured to intercede, but was reproved with so much bitterness, that, in defence of her own dignity, she found herself likewise compelled to withdraw; nor was she recalled until an apology, personally conveyed, assured her of repentance for the utterance of hasty expressions, and a promise of abstaining in future from the like. Since this event, the harmony existing at the Tuileries has been unbroken, for Madame Adelaide possessed in an enviable degree that quality which, according to Montesquieu, was peculiar to Cæsar and the Regent of Orleans, that of being invulnerable to offence when only directed against themselves.

THE ENGRAVING.

The Illustration shows the impressive ceremony of the Funeral of the Princess Adelaide, in the Chapel of the Tuileries. This Chapel is somewhat small, and is in plain Doric style. On this occasion, the walls were hung with black, as high as the first story, as were the columns, which had plaited capitals; and the altar was covered with black, except the upper part and the columns, which are of white marble. The catafalque was hung with black velvet drapery, embroidered with silver stars, and surrounded with wax-lights, in the midst of which was an escutcheon of black velvet, embroidered with the initials "A. O." in silver. The whole was a scene of imposing solemnity.

GENERAL DE LAMORICIERE.

GENERAL de Lamoricière is the present Commander of the French province of Oran, and the Commander of the Army under the Duke d'Aumale, the Governor-General. He was well known as the ablest of the officers under General Bugeaud; but he is more popular than that chief, whose manners are said to be strongly marked by the ton du garrison. General Lamoricière has just been fortunate enough to have had the principal share in compelling the surrender of Abd-el Kader. His troops were in such a position that the Arab chief had no alternative, after failing in his attempts to force his way through the Moorish army, than to surrender to the Moors, to the French, or be driven into the sea. It is from General Lamoricière's letter to the Duke d'Aumale, that the details of Abd-el-Kader's attempt have been made known. His chief reliance was on the following stratagem:—

"His intention was to surprise the Morocco forces by a night attack. In order to facilitate this plan, he devised the following stratagem. Four camels, smeared with pitch all over, were loaded with dry plants, beaten fine by the hand, so as to form masses of a sort of tow. All this was again covered with pitch. Four foot soldiers, who were liberally paid beforehand, were to conduct these animals, and on arriving at the Morocco camp they were to set on fire all this inflammable matter. The effect which an apparition of this nature in the midst of an ill-guarded camp, consisting chiefly of cavalry, and composed of ill-disciplined troops, would produce, may be easily imagined."

The stratagem will remind the classic reader of one tried by Hannibal (also an African) when hemmed in by the Roman forces; he tied combustibles to the horns of oxen, and, setting fire to them, drove them in the night up the mountains. But Hannibal, we believe, succeeded, and Abd-el-Kader did not. Though animals are expended in war with as little scruple as men, it is impossible to help pitying the fate of these poor camels; the "ships of the desert" were never before converted into "fire-ships." The Duc d'Aumale, in his despatch, says—

GENERAL LAMORICIÈRE.

"I cannot congratulate General de Lamoricière too much upon the part he has acted in this important event. I cannot speak too highly of the sagacity, prudence, and decision which he has displayed, and which have had so much influence on the satisfactory termination of this serious affair."

Crosses and honours no doubt await him. Perhaps he will have leisure now to attend to the civil affairs of the Colony. The state of things is not satisfactory; The Presse says [illegible]

MONUMENT TO CAPTAIN JOHN MOORE NAPIER

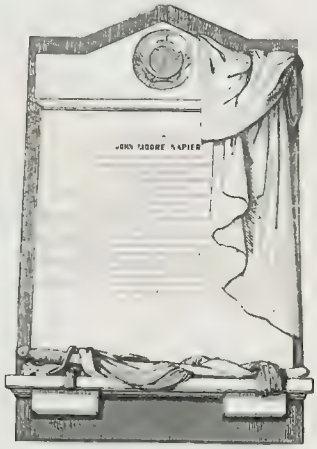
THIS unostentatious tribute to the memory of a meritorious officer has just been completed by Mr. Richard Westmacott, A.R.A., and will be shortly placed in Chester Cathedral. It is, as our Illustration shows, a mural tablet, of neat design, supported upon a pair of trusses; at the foot lie the sword, belt, and sash; upon one side hangs a military cloak; and within the pediment are sculptured the arms of the deceased. The inscription is as follows:



MONUMENT TO CAPTAIN JOHN MOORE NAPIER.

To the Memory of
JOHN MOORE NAPIER,
Captain in H. M. 62nd Regiment,
Who died of Asiatic Cholera,
In Scinde,
on the 7th July, 184-,
Aged 29 years.
The tomb is no record of high lineage:
His may be traced by his name
His race was one of soldiers.
Among soldiers he lived, among them he died
A soldier falling, where numbers fell with him,
In a barbarous land;
Yet there none died more generous,
More daring, more gifted, or more religious.
On his early grave
Fell the tears of stern and hardy men,
As his had fallen on the graves of others
To the Memory of their Comrade,
The Officers of the General Staff in Scinde
Erected this Cenotaph

HER MAJESTY'S STEAM-FRIGATE "AVENGER," LOST UPON THE SORELLI ROCKS.

THE LOSS OF "THE AVENGER."

IN our late edition of last week we gave the following further details respecting this melancholy disaster, from more recent advices from Malta than those already published:—

When the vessel struck upon the rocks laid down on the chart, two boats were instantly lowered; one containing Lieutenant Rooke, the surgeon, second master, and five others, who hoped to be in a situation to render assistance to their companions; but, the sea running high, they were driven out to a hopeless distance, from which they saw the vessel thrown upon her beam ends, with the sea making clear breaches over her.

The violence of the weather drove the boat ashore at Bizerta, and in the attempt to land she was swamped, and only four persons, besides Lieutenant Rooke, reached the land. Some friendly Arabs rushed through the surf to rescue the poor fellows, and, carrying them on their backs, provided them with refreshments, and the means of getting to Tunis, from whence the news was despatched to this place. The French authorities lost no time in despatching aid to the scene of the wreck; and some faint hopes are yet entertained that more of the ill-fated crew may be ultimately saved by boats, or on spars.

Little doubt seems now to exist that it was in endeavouring to make too direct a course from Gibraltar to Malta that the steamer touched on the rocks which abound off the Barbary coast near Tunis. However, all is conjecture, until the survivors have communicated the sad details of the catastrophe.

We add the following from the Daily News:—

"The arrival of the Oriental Company's steam-packet Sultan, at Southampton, had excited hopes that some additional tidings of the Avenger would be brought by her, as she might have met with the Hecate, the Locoinar, or any of the vessels that had been sent to the scene of the wreck, but she brings no intelligence whatever. The last ever seen of the crew of the Avenger was on board the Pacha, at Gibraltar, when about an hour before the Avenger left that port, the master came on board to ask news from England.

"The following letter, by a naval officer much experienced in the navigation of the Mediterranean, relates to the currents in the Mediterranean at the time of the loss of the Avenger:—

"'SIR,—It may be remembered that on the morning of the day on which this sad event occurred, the Avenger was seen by the steam-packet Pacha in the offing, on her port beam, hull down, and distant about twelve or thirteen miles. In running up the Mediterranean for Malta, it is usual to pass to the northward, or outside the dangers of the coast of Tunis, as you draw towards Cape Bon, and it was concluded the Avenger had shaped her course accordingly; and, had it not been for the very strong set to the southward, which was more perceptible to the Pacha in-shore than it could be in the offing, the former would, in all probability, have reached her destination in perfect safety. As a proof of what has been asserted relative to the current, on the morning of the 19th, the day previous to the disaster, the Pacha, at daylight, was found to have drawn so close into the land from the southerly set, that she had to alter her course two and a half points to the northward for some time, to clear Cape Teney, lying to the westward of the town of Algiers; and again on the 21st, the day following the wreck, the Pacha having taken her departure from Cape Bon at noon, it was necessary, on making the island of Pantelaria the same afternoon at three o'clock, to alter the course nearly five points to pass to the northward of it, so great was the southerly set in this short space of time. Likewise on the return of the Sultan packet with the India mail not many days after, the same current was observable; expecting to pass the island of Pantelaria in the course of the night, her course was shaped to take her well to the northward of it; but in the morning she was found further to the southward than could possibly have been anticipated; and for three successive days, in steering for Gibraltar, it was proved by the chronometers that there was a daily set to the southward varying from 17 to 34 miles.'"

We have been favoured by a Correspondent, (who last year visited Algeria) with the two accompanying Sketches, taken on the spot, of the coast of Africa, whereon the Avenger is believed to have been lost. The first Sketch shows the Fratelli Rocks, and, says our Correspondent, the coast on which Lieutenant Rooke (of the Avenger) must have been driven, as it is about 35 miles eastward of the town that he first arrived at. In the second Sketch is seen part of the coast between Tunis and Bona, "near where Lieutenant Rooke was driven." Our Correspondent adds that he twice passed over the spot, which must be close to the Sorelli Rocks: the island of Galita was in the distance, and when the Sketch was taken, the exact outline could not be made out, as it was covered with a mist.

THE FRATELLI ROCKS, ON THE NORTH COAST OF AFRICA.

NORTH COAST OF AFRICA, BETWEEN TUNIS AND BONA.

Of the 61 fatal Accidents, we also annex an Illustration. She was a first-class war steamer, built in Sir W. Symonds's plan, at Devonport, in 1845; 1445 tons, 560 horse power, armament on deck, 8 56-pounders; between, 8 32 pounders; length, 226 feet 9 inches; on deck, 210 feet; breadth, 39 feet. The entire details will be found appended to the account of her launch, in No 179 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, page 111

Letters were received on Friday (yesterday), at the Admiralty, from Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Carlis, dated Malta, 4th January, reporting the return of the Hecate to that port, after a close but fruitless search for any survivors from the wreck of H. M. late ship Avenger, and reporting that scarcely a vestige of the ill-fated ship could be found on the rocks and islands adjacent to the scene of wreck

No hopes are therefore entertained at the Admiralty of any lives being saved, excepting those of Lieutenants Rooke and the three other persons landed from the Avenger's cutter on the Barbary coast.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1848.

As long as an old form is suffered to go unchallenged it may be harmless enough; but, if it is subjected to any test or actual trial, it often becomes a scandal or an absurdity. The scenes that have occurred in two of the metropolitan churches during the past week, on the Confirmation of two Prelates of the Church, have shown the right of objecting to any person named to the Episcopal office by the Crown to be such a shadow of a shade, that it really becomes the Church to consider whether it would not be better to abolish the citation of "objectors" to appear altogether. Indeed, as the law and practice stand, and have stood for centuries, it would be preferable to make the induction of a Bishop follow immediately on his nomination by the Crown, without any subsequent form of election, where there is no right or possibility of rejection, in which the essence of the elective principle consists.

The election by the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, forcibly recalls the scene in the "Coriolanus" of Shakespere, where the citizens discuss their right of choice in the election of the Consul :—

Once, if he do require our voices, we ought not to deny him
We may, Sir, if we will.
We have power in ourselves to do it; but it is a power that we have no power to do

That is the exact definition of the right of a Cathedral Chapter in the Election of a Bishop. The direction to choose supposes a right to refuse; but it turns out to be "a power that we have no power to do." If we follow the proceeding to the next stage, the nomination of the election, we meet another old form, still more empty, and, for all practical purpose, utterly useless. "All manner of persons" are summoned to "make their objections in due form of law" to the new Bishop, "and they shall be heard." But, if an objector does appear, the law is so stringent that it does not allow him to be heard at all; he can only claim to be heard, and be told that all objections are useless! Beyond lodging that claim there is no form of proceeding known to the law by which an objection can be enforced or sustained. It is a perfect nullity, a traditionary custom, unsupported by any legal enactment. The Vicar-General says expressly :—

The act itself prescribes no mode of proceeding in the performance of the duty enjoined, nor refers to any; the office whence these proceedings issue supplies none beyond the form now in use, and which has prevailed and been acted upon for a period of 300 years. The citation and proclamation may seem to imply the existence of others in the call made by them upon opposers to appear and make their objections if they have any; but how these objections are to be received, in what form to be made, how to be proved or sustained, and with what result, is nowhere, that I can find, laid down with reference to the ceremony of confirmation by any book of authority, or writer on the law, or the practice thereof, as prevailing and existing in the country.

The Law of the Realm leaves no alternative to a Chapter but to elect, or to the Archbishop but to confirm, the person appointed by the Crown. The challenging objections to the confirmation is uselessly to invite a perhaps angry controversy. The challenge might very well be dispensed with; the ecclesiastical lawyers would have no difficulty in drawing up a form of Confirmation that should exclude it; but it is only a repetition of that which has been in use for some three centuries; but, till altered by authority, it must, we presume, be read just as it stands. The spirit of the time is not so tolerant of these legal fictions that they can be continued with safety to the Church. There are not wanting those who would gladly seize every opportunity of "objecting" to a Confirmation, for the mere purpose of casting some tinge of ridicule on the forms of the Established Church. What was the feeling of the mass who filled Bow Church on Tuesday last? When the decision had been given that the law of the land allowed of no objections of any kind to the proceedings, and the formal documents proving the Bishop's election had been read, the challenge to the "objectors" to come forward, was made a second time! With what result? This—

Opposers were then again publicly called, but the proclamation was received with loud laughter and shouts of "Oh, oh!" "A mockery," mingled with cries of "Shame," and "Order."

In a consecrated temple is not such a manifestation a scandal? Should not a repetition of the scene be made impossible? No law requires changing; it is only a useless form to be abolished.

Custom calls us to't:
What custom wills, in all things should we do't,
The dust on antique Time would lie unswept
And mountainous Error be too highly heap'd
For Truth, to over-peer

A ROBBERY has this week been committed in a train on the Great Western Line, which deserves to be noticed on account of the inconceivable carelessness which could alone have given to the thieves the chance of appropriating such an enormous booty. A box, containing, it is said, from £4000 to £6000 in sovereigns, was sent from London to a house at Taunton; it was booked at Paddington, like a common parcel, put into a first-class carriage, and left there unwatched all the way between London and Bristol. A gang of London thieves must have got information and very minute information, too—of the box, its contents, and its whereabouts in the train; for six persons of "fashionable exterior" engaged the whole of the next carriage, cut an opening into the one containing the box, cut a hole in the box itself, emptied it, and got clear off with the whole of the money! The Superintendent, on looking for the box, at Bristol, found it in that mournful state of emptiness—the thousands in gold evaporated and dispersed none can tell where!

Now, we ask if it is not inconceivable how any banking or mercantile firm, or any man of business, could venture to transmit such a sum without some one to take express charge of it? The first-class fare to Taunton and back, for a clerk or agent, would not be ruinous; and, with the ramifications that roguery has in this city, it is little less than madness to trust such a mass of wealth without having it, as the French say, gardé à vue by a confidential person. It is the easiest thing in the world to render such a robbery impossible; but, if the owners of such wealth will not sacrifice the trifling per centage on it that would suffice to grant it between point and point, they must be surprised to find themselves stripped of it by their carelessness is inexcusable. But another question arises out of this affair. How were the "swell mob" so well informed of all the particulars respecting this box of gold, of the train it would go by, of the precise carriage it would be in? How could they take the whole carriage next to it, without exciting either notice or suspicion? Granting these gentry the most acute powers of observation, it seems to us they must have had some information from persons connected with the railway office. There have been other robberies at the Paddington Station, that look very suspicious in this respect; and it behoves the Directors to institute the most searching enquiry.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE CASE OF DR. HAMPDEN

In the Court of QUEEN'S BENCH yesterday (Friday), Sir Fitzroy Kelly obtained a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and to Dr. Burnaby, his Vicar-General, commanding them to allow the Rev. Mr. Overbury, and two other beneficed clergymen, to be heard in opposition to the Confirmation of the Bishop elect of Hereford, and to determine on such opposition

IRELAND.—SPECIAL COMMISSION, COUNTY CLARE. The Judges opened the Special Commission for this county, at Ennis, on Wednesday last. The Grand Jury having been sworn, and addressed by the Lord Chief Baron, the day was occupied in examining and finding "true bills" in the several cases of indictment submitted to their consideration.

MONEY ORDERS. A return just published, from which the following is an extract, will convey some idea of the enormous number of money orders issued by the various postmasters in the United Kingdom:—At the General Post-Office there were issued during the quarter ending the 5th January, in round numbers, about 12,000; at Edinburgh, 13,000; Dublin, 30,000; Liverpool, 30,000; Manchester, 30,000; Birmingham, 17,000; Glasgow, 16,000; Bristol, 12,000; Hull, 10,000; Southampton, 7000; Brighton, 10,000; Bath, 8000. The number of orders issued in London is immense. There are thirty-five branch and receiving-offices within the three mile circle that are money order offices, and in addition to the 17,000 issued at the General Office, there were granted at the Lombard-street branch office during the last quarter, as many as at the Bristol office; and at the Charing-cross branch office, as many as were granted by the Postmaster of the Strand receiving-house, there were granted about 7000; at the office in the Borough, about 5000; and at the Edgware-road street office, about 4000. There are also forty-four London receiving-houses beyond the three mile circle which grant and pay money orders.

NEW ZEALAND

The latest advices mention that an encounter took place on the 19th of July last, between our troops and the natives at Wanganui, which, from the very mystified account given in Col. McCreverty's despatch, relative to the affair, would appear to have terminated much in favour of the natives, as of our troops, of whom, there were one officer wounded, two men killed, and eleven wounded (one, Royal Artillery, mortally, since dead)

CONFIRMATION OF DR. HAMPDEN, THE NEW BISHOP OF HEREFORD.

TUESDAY being appointed for the Confirmation of the election of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford, the doors of Bow Church, Cheapside, in which edifice the proceedings were to take place, were besieged by a crowd of persons anxious to be present; and the church was crowded to excess in a few minutes after it was opened. An attempt was made to preserve a few pews in the immediate neighbourhood of the pulpit and desk, for those who were to take part in the proceedings; but the vacant circle was narrower every minute. Four or five persons occupied the pulpit, and the open space in front of the communion table was so full that it was difficult to pass from the vestry into the centre aisle. Among those who were present we observed—The Dean of Hereford, the Rev. Dr. Virtue, Rev. Dr. Wright, Rev. Messrs. Hughes, Hessey, E. Hawkins, E. Symons, Tottenham, Scott, Dodsworth, Webb, Irons, Richards, Wade, G. Miller, Sebb, Eden, M'Leod, Pocock, Bittlestone, Blunt, Wix, Powell, and, indeed, a host of clergymen. A few minutes before eleven o'clock, the Alderman Sir John Shaw, Alderman Salomons, and Mr. Waugh, made his way through the crowd, and took his seat in the Corporation pew; and shortly afterwards the Vicar-General of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Burnaby, came from the vestry in his robes, followed by his assessor, Sir J. Dodson, and by Dr. Lushington and Sir J. Dodson, who all three took their seats at a table placed in front of the reading desk, near to which were seated, in the middle aisle, Mr. F. H. Dyke, Principal Registrar of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the advocates for the Chapter of Hereford, Dr. Bayford and Dr. Twiss; Mr. Glenny, Proctor for Dr. Hampden; Mr. John Burder, of Parliament-street, Dr. Hampden's Secretary; Dr. Addams, Dr. Harding, and Dr. R. Phillimore, advocates for the opposers, and Messrs. Townsend and Roberts, the Proctors who instructed them

The Litany was read by the Venerable Archdeacon Hamilton, Rector of St. Mary-le-Bow, whose sonorous voice sounded strangely familiar in the vicinity of the desk; though, in the remoter parts of the spacious Church, signs of impatience soon began to manifest themselves, and it was impossible to doubt that very many persons had come "for nothing else but to hear some new thing." During the argument which followed the religious service, a constant buzz of conversation was kept up among the spectators

Prayers being concluded,

Mr Underwood, the Chapter-Clerk of Hereford advanced towards the Vicar-General, and said: "Right Worshipful Sir, I exhibit my proxy for the Rev. the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, and thereby invest a party for them, and do present unto you the letters patent of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, issued under the Great Seal of Great Britain, for the confirmation of the election of the Rev. R. D. Hampden, D.D., to be Bishop and Pastor of the said Church, and do pray that the same may be read."

The letters patent were then read accordingly, as follows:

"Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith; to the Most Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and right entirely beloved councillor, William, by Divine Providence, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, and to all other Bishops herein concerned, greeting. Whereas the Episcopal See of Hereford, being lately vacant by the translation of the Right Rev. Father in God, Dr. Thomas Musgrave, late Bishop thereof, to the Archiepiscopal See of York, upon the humble petition of the Dean and Chapter of our Cathedra Church of Hereford, we did by our letters patent grant them our leave and license to choose to themselves another Bishop and Pastor of the said See; and the said Dean and Chapter, by virtue of our said leave and license have chosen for themselves and the said Church, our trusty and well-beloved Rand Dickson Hampden, D.D., to be our Bishop and Pastor, as by their letters sealed with their common seal, directed to us thereupon, does more fully appear; we, accepting of such election, have given our Royal assent thereto; and this we signify unto you by these presents, requiring and strictly commanding you, by the faith and allegiance by which you stand bound to us, to confirm the said election, and to consecrate the said R. D. Hampden, D.D., so as aforesaid chosen by the said Dean and Chapter of the said See, and to create with due diligence, favour, and effect, all and singular other things which belong to your pastoral office, according to the laws and statutes of England in the behalf made and provided. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself at Westminster, the 6th day of January, in the 11th year of our reign. By writ of Privy Seal."

Mr Underwood then prayed the Vicar-General to take upon him the duty of the confirmation, and to decree that it be proceeded in according to the form of the letters patent and the exigency of the law, and the Vicar-General, in obedience to her Majesty's command, took upon himself that duty, and decreed as prayed

Dr. Hampden was then conducted from his pew to the table, and took his seat opposite the Vicar General; Mr Underwood declaring that he presented the Bishop elect, and judicially produced his Lordship, and that as Proctor for the said Dean and Chapter he also exhibited an original mandate, together with a certificate thereupon endorsed, touching the execution of the said mandate against all and singular opposers, and the Proctor added that he prayed they might be publicly called.

Then the Apparitor-General, by command of the Vicar-General, made proclamation as follows:

"O yes, oyez, oyez: all manner of persons who shall or will object to the confirmation of the Rev. R. D Hampden, D.D., to be Bishop and Pastor of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, let them come forward and make their objections in due form of law, and they shall be heard."

Mr. R. Townsend, the Proctor, immediately stood forward, and said I appear for the Rev. Richard Webster Huntley, Clerk, Vicar of Alberbury, in county of Salop and Diocese of Hereford, Master of Arts of the University of Oxford; the Rev. John Jebb, Clerk, Rector of Peterstow, in the county and Diocese of Hereford, Master of Arts of Trinity College, Dublin; and the Rev. William Frederick Powell, Clerk, Perpetual Curate of Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, Master of Arts of the University of Cambridge, and exhibit proxies under their hands and seals respectively, and declare I oppose the Confirmation of the elect, Rand Dickson Hampden, Lord elected to the office or dignity of Bishop of Hereford.

The Vicar-General, as we understood, inquired whether Mr. Townsend had not his objections in writing; but, on Mr. Townsend answering in the negative, desired him to select a document from his papers, added—We are acting here under a mandate from the Crown, issued pursuant to the provisions of the statute of the 25th of Henry VIII, cap. 20, and we conceive ourselves bound to confirm without suffering any opposition.

Mr Townsend (apparently answering the Vicar-General's question) Right Worshipful sir, I will bring in a libel.

Dr Lushington: No, you will not. You are not permitted to appear; and, Mr. Townsend, you know perfectly well, as an ecclesiastical practitioner, that you are not able to bring in a libel until you are permitted to appear

Dr. Addams: I appear for

Dr Bayford: I object to this, on behalf of the Dean and Chapter. The Court has already decided that Mr. Townsend is not to appear for his parties, and now my learned friend wants to appear for nobody.

Dr. Addams: I appear, and beg to be heard—

The Vicar-General: Upon what do you wish to be heard?

Dr. Addams: Upon the statute

The Vicar-General: You mean upon the question, whether you have a right to be heard or not?

Dr. Addams: Precisely so.

The Vicar-General: We confine you to that.

Dr. Addams: I do not mean to say a word beyond that point.

Dr. Lushington: Distinctly understand to what you are confined—namely, to the question whether, considering the statute of Henry VIII, which has been referred to, you have a right, notwithstanding that statute, to be heard at all.

Dr. Addams: I will confine my observations to that. I certainly did not expect an objection to my being heard upon that. However, the Court has decided that I must be heard upon that point; and I may say I undertake to satisfy the Court that the statute has nothing whatever to do with the present question; and I shall be exceedingly surprised if their ultimate decision should be that it is incompetent to them to entertain this objection to the Confirmation of the Lord elected Bishop of Hereford, by reason of any provision of that statute; and after considering what the true construction of that statute is, I shall be surprised, indeed, if this Court decline to entertain this objection under the supposition that by so doing they will fall within the penalties of præmunire.

Dr. Bayford: I must beg leave to interpose.

Dr. Addams: I know my learned friend's pugnacity; but really he is wrong now.

Dr. Bayford: My learned friend is standing here offering an argument for nobody; the Court has already decided that it will hear no opponent.

Dr. Lushington: No, no; the Court has decided that Dr. Addams should be heard upon the question, whether he has a right to appear for the parties named in the proxy. [So we understood the learned Doctor, but the remark was made in a very indistinct tone.]

Dr. Addams: He having pledged himself to confine himself to that question.

Dr. Addams would take care not to go beyond it. It would be necessary to begin with a brief reference to the history and introduction of this statute. Bishoprics, it was well known, were anciently donative by the Crown, by far more common than they are at the present day. Afterwards the election was by the Chapter; and it was supposed to be a free election, and founded upon the congé d'elire. But it was agreed that the confirmation and consecration of a Bishop at elected belonged to the Pope, and by that means the Pope had in effect the disposal of all the bishoprics in England. (See 1 Inst, 134.) But the Popes were not content with merely the confirmation and consecration, but resulted on various occasions upon collating or nominating to bishoprics, and that produced the first enactment, 25th Edward III., c. 6. That statute provided—"That free election of Archbishops, Bishops, and all other dignities and benefices vacant in England shall from henceforth be in the manner as they were granted by the King's progenitors and the ancestors of other lords, founders of the said dignities and other benefices. And in case that reservation, collation, and provision be made by the Court of Rome of any archbishopric, bishopric, dignity, or any other benefice, in disturbance of the free elections aforesaid, the King shall have for that time the collations to the archbishoprics and other benefices, and the thus think fit, to proceed to the giving our definitive sanction or final decree in this business, in manner following:—Whereas, by the acts enacted, deduced, alleged, propounded, exhibited, and proved before us relating to such confirmation, we have amply found and do find that the said election was rightly and lawfully made and celebrated by the Dean and Chapter of the said Cathedral Church of Hereford of the said Rev. the Bishop elect, a man both prudent and discreet, deservedly laudable for his life and conversation, of a free condition, born in lawful wedlock, of due age, and an ordained priest, and that there neither was nor is anything in the ecclesiastical laws that ought to obstruct or hinder his being confirmed by our authority Bishop of the said See; therefore, we, S. B. Burnaby, Doctor of Laws, the Judge aforesaid, having weighed and considered the premises, and with the assistance of the learned in the law, do, by the authority wherewith we are invested, confirm the aforesaid election made and celebrated of the person of the said Rev. R. D. Hampden, D.D., to the Bishopric of Hereford. And we do, as far as is in our power and by law we may, supply all defects whatsoever, in the said election, if any there happen to be. And we do commit unto the said Bishop elected and confirmed the care, government, and administration of the Spirituals of the said Bishopric of Hereford. And we do pronounce, decree, and order, by this our definitive sentence or final decree, which we make and publish in these presents, that the said Bishop so elected and confirmed, or his lawful proctor for him, shall be inducted into the real, actual, and corporal possession of the said Bishopric, and of all its rights, dignities, honours, privileges, and appurtenances whatsoever, and be installed and enthroned by the Archdeacon of Canterbury, or by his deputy, according to the laudable and approved manner and custom of the said Cathedral Church, not being contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm."

The proceedings then terminated, and the crowd began to leave the church. Dr. Hampden took his leave immediately, and, on reaching the street, was cheered vehemently. The people, however, began to press upon him very inconveniently; and the Apparitor-General, who was conducting him out, found it quite impossible to reach the Doctor's carriage, and with some difficulty placed him in the coach that stood nearest.

It was rumoured that an application would be made to the Court of Queen's Bench to interfere in regard to the election and proceedings thereupon.

THE BISHOP OF HEREFORD.

Dr. Hampden entered Oxford University in 1809 as a commoner of Oriel College, and passed his examination for the degree of B.A. At the same time with his predecessor in the chair of Moral Philosophy, Mr. Mill, of Magdalen College, Dr. Hampden's name appears in the first of "Literæ Humaniores," and also of "Disciplinæ Mathematicæ et Physicæ" in the year 1813. Dr. Hampden subsequently obtained the prize for the Latin Essay in 1814, and was successively fellow and tutor of Oriel College. In 1829 and again in 1831, he filled the office of Public Examiner in Classics. In 1832 he was Bampton University Lecturer. In 1833 he was elected White's Professor of Moral Philosophy; and in 1836 had the Regius Professorship of Divinity conferred upon him by the Ministry of the day. His [illegible] were the "Bampton Lectures," which have recently occasioned so much discussion, and "The Philosophical Evidences of Christianity and Observations on Dissent." He has written several minor works, and has contributed to the most popular Encyclopædias. He was appointed to the Principalship of St. Mary Hall by Lord Granville.

THE DEAN OF HEREFORD.

Dr. John Merewether, Dean of Hereford, who has taken so prominent a position in opposing the election of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford, has distinguished himself by his very extensive and tasteful repair of the Cathedral, as well as by the pious zeal with which he has discharged the duties of his high office. The Dean is an able member of the Archæological Institute, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. During the Confirmation, on Tuesday, the Dean was in plain dress, and sat in one of the side pews of the church.

THE CONFIRMATION.

The Illustration shows that point of the ceremony at which the New Bishop ushered by the gentlemen, with the mace, &c., is about to take his seat at the end of the table; whilst the officer with the book stands ready to record any objection made to the election.

MISS POOLE.

Of the "signal success" of Miss Poole's performance of Maria, in "The Daughter of the Regiment," at the Surrey Theatre, we spoke emphatically in our Journal of December 25. We have now the gratification of presenting to our readers a very characteristic Portrait of the gay Vivandière, from a drawing by Mr. Frederick Goodall, whose taste also designed the very pleasing costume.

Miss Poole received her early education in music from the late Mr. J. T. Harris, to whom she was apprenticed when a child. At this time, her precocious talent was surprising; and she appeared at Drury-Lane and Covent-Garden, in pieces written for her.

Many of our readers will doubtless recollect the then popular song of the "Merry Little Drummer," in the "Legion of Honour," composed expressly for Miss Poole, by Alexander Lee, in which she played the drum to perfection, and sang it two hundred nights, to a nightly encore.

In the year 1839, she became the pupil of the late Mr. T. Giubilei, and accompanied that gentleman's party to America, where she played in numerous operas with great success.

For the last two years, Miss Poole has availed herself of the valuable instructions of Mr Frank Romer; and under his guidance is rapidly attaining a high position in her profession.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

PARIS, Thursday.

On Monday night I was present at the first representation of Rossini's beautiful work "La Donna del Lago," at the Theatre Italien. A more ludicrous mise en scène I never have witnessed. Being somewhat acquainted with the scenery at this theatre, I can give you a notion how Sir Walter Scott's lake scenery was depicted. The opening scene was in Greece, with Sappho's rock in the foreground; the second scene was made up from "Maria di Rohan"—French, of course: the third scene, with the bridge, was partly from "Linda da Chamouni," and partly Corsican scenery, from "La Fidanzata Corsa." In the second act, we had the Doge's room in Venice, a grotto in Corsica, and the last scene from "La Cenerentola." As to the costumes, the tartans were of the Egyptian and Babylonian styles—some of the soldiers were in Spanish dresses with Paxton hats; Coletti, who was the Douglas of Angus, had a Corsican dress from "La Fidanzata Corsa," mixed with Scotch pepper-and-salt attributes; Gardoni, who was the Roderick, had a most extraordinary mixture, which is indescribable. The military band was composed of dummies, headed by men with enormous French horns.

This mounting was too much, even for the good-humoured habitués, and there was from time to time an explosion of laughter. It was, as the bills truly affirmed, "une représentation extraordinaire," not, however, for the benefit of Gardoni, as stated, but for the amusement of the public. Before the performance began, an apology was made for Alboni, who had a cold.

As for the chorus and orchestra, they were equally intolerable. The band without a spark of brilliancy at the violins; a tone of shrillness in the wind instruments; the drums wooden and overweening; the brass harsh and discordant—had not even the merit of pertinence of attack and answer. To those amateurs who had heard the performance of this fine work last season at the Royal Italian Opera, the infliction at the Italiens here was, indeed, terrible. Nor was the cast of the principals at all calculated to satisfy the auditory, notwithstanding the strength in names. Grisi was not so brilliant in Elena as in Lucia: on Tuesday night, the second performance, she sang, however, the finale with its florid divisions, exquisitely. Alboni was, on both occasions, too tame and spiritless for the impassioned Malcolm; although in the duo with Grisi, in the second act, her superb organ was heard to the best advantage. The Rossinian music is not at all adapted for Coletti; and I am surprised that Labbache did not resume his part of Douglas, in which he was wont to produce such an effect. The character of Roderick Dhu was quite out of Gardoni's element; had as Bettini was last season, at Covent Garden Theatre, his energy was preferable to the physical debility of Gardoni: he introduced, as his aria di sortita, a scena by Tadolini, the Musical Director of the Italiens, but it was a very indifferent composition, indifferently sung. Dal Fiori, who played the friend of Malcolm, created a merriment at every note, that gave the opera the air of a Palais Royal farce. The honours of both representations fell on Mario. I can afford you no idea of the sensation produced by this tenor. He had been suffering for two months under influenza, and it was imagined that it would be a long time before his voice would be right. Nevertheless, so far from this prophecy being fulfilled, he came out with a force and brilliancy which I do not think he ever before attained. His vocalisation was of the purest and polished style; there was a pathos and energy, a facility and flexibility, a profound sensibility, and a sublimity of expression in his cavatina in the second act, which took the house completely by storm. There was a hurricane of bravoes, and the cries of "Bis! bis!" were deafening. Four times was he called for in succession, the whole house rising to cheer—the ladies waving handkerchiefs and throwing bouquets with fervor. I have rarely witnessed more exciting displays than those of Monday and Tuesday evenings at this great vocal triumph of Mario. M. Vatel ought, indeed, to be grateful, for Mario saved the opera from a failure.

I witnessed the fourteenth representation of Verdi's "Jerusalem," at the Académie Royale. I see no reason to modify my opinion of its merits. It is evidently a failure, for it has ceased to draw money. Duprez's voice is now nearly gone, but it is astonishing what he can still do with it as an actor and singer. In the first act, he managed to raise the enthusiasm of the audience. Madame Julian Van Guelder was heard in Leonora to advantage, and is therefore well calculated for Verdi's strains. Ahzard, the bass, had a magnificent organ, but his dwarfish and fat figure is against him. I announced to you the engagement of Roger for Meyerbeer's "Prophète." Madame Pauline Garcia Viardot has not yet accepted the contract of M. M. Duponchel and Roqueplan; but Meyerbeer has written to her, and I think it probable the composer will persuade her to be the prima donna of the Académie. She is now creating a powerful sensation in Berlin, in Valentine in his "Huguenots" —in the "Somnambula"—in Norma—in Romea in "Il Barbiere," Alice in "Robert le Diable," &c. The rehearsals for the "Prophète" begin in September, and it is to be produced on the 17th of January, 1849. Gueseo, the Italian tenor, has been engaged also at the Académie. He is now with Salvi, Tamburini, Frazzolani, Angri, &c., at St. Petersburgh.

Auber's "Haydée" is drawing immense houses at the Opera Comique. M. Roger, who is the representative of the Venetian Admiral Loredan, in addition to his engagement at the Académie, which begins in September next, and is for two years, at 60,000 francs per year, has just signed a contract for the forthcoming season, at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. He will make his début in the opera of "Ismène," the Italian version of which will be written by Signor Giamboni. Auber will compose the recitatives, and make some changes expressly for the Covent Garden company, and there is a great probability of his visiting London, to superintend the mounting of his masterpiece. This is the first time that one of Auber's productions has been prepared for the Italian stage in London; and, with the coming of such a famed tenor and fine actor as Roger, will create no little curiosity and interest in our musical circles.

In addition to Mdlle. Lind, Madame Tadolini, and Madame Montenegro, as prima donne for her Majesty's Theatre, the engagements of Madame Barbieri, now at the San Carlo, in Naples, and of Madame Stoltz, are rumoured. The latter is now in Paris, and offered to sing gratis for six months at the Opera National, which was declined by M. Adam, the Director. There is also a report that she will appear at the Opera Comique, with Duprez and Barrolhet, who leave the Académie Royale shortly.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.—An old "man-of-war's man," the bostwain of a yacht belonging to a gentleman who was about to sail for the Mediterranean, having obtained a brief leave of absence, went lately to London in one of the Gravesend steamers. In the boat he met with a young man, a servant to one of the officers at Tilbury Fort, whom he had never seen before, and on returning the next day, he found the same man on board, and "Jack" having scraped acquaintance, they entered into conversation, during which the officer's servant stated that he was to start for China in ten days, and that he had been to town to see a lawyer respecting some property to which he believed he was heir; but upon referring to the will it had been discovered that he was only to inherit the property in the event of an uncle, supposed to be drowned some years since, not coming forward to claim it. The name of a Lord Glanville being mentioned, the sailor observed, "Why, messmate, I have heard and know that name well." Mutual explanations took place, when it turned out that the bostswain was the very missing uncle, and will now inherit the property, worth in all about £5000.

DISCOVERY OF AN ANCIENT EDIFICE.—In digging foundations for a new court of correctional police in the Court and to the south of the Sainte-Chapelle of the Palace of Justice, at Paris, a surface of from 400 to 500 square mètres, forming the foundations of an ancient edifice, have been discovered. These consist of several chambers, with walls two mètres in thickness, like those of the Palais de Thermes, Rue de la Harpe. As in the Parvis Notre Dame, parts of columns, medals, broken crockery, and some small works of art, have been found.

LITERARY DISCOVERY.—An enrolment has been found of the letters belonging to Edward, the first Prince of Wales; which from its antiquity of above five centuries, its interesting contents, with its historical bearings, besides being the only record of that nature in existence, is decidedly the most important discovery of modern times.

THE ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—In consequence of the action which was recently raised by Miss Hoare against Captain Dickson, as Secretary of this institution, a very considerable expense has been incurred, and a subscription has been got up to liquidate the debt. This will enable the society to apply its funds to the objects which its promoters had in view. The subscription has already reached a considerable sum.

THE Government have determined upon granting a gratuity of £70 to the widow of the late Mr. James Walker, surgeon, of Manchester, who died in the early part of last year of fever, taken in the discharge of his duty as medical officer of the London-road district. We understand that Government has also granted similar gratuities in some cases at Liverpool and Chester.

SOLE-FISHING.

THE Artist has chosen for the locality of this picturesque British Fishery, the Silver Slip, about fourteen miles off Flamborough Head, on the Yorkshire coast, where he shows us Margate boats trawling for Soles. The Silver Slip was discovered about six years ago, by chance: it then appeared to be a fault in the strata about three-quarters of a mile long, the depth from 24 fathoms, dropping suddenly down to about 40 fathoms. When the Silver Slip was first found, the fishermen considered there to have been a bed 5 or 6 feet thick of fish; but it is now nearly all worked out.

The Sole inhabits the sandy shore all round our coast, where it keeps to the bottom, and feeds upon small testaceous animals, and the fry of other fishes: as Soles will not readily take bait, they are almost entirely caught by trawling. Mr. Yarrell states that eighty-six thousand bushels of Soles have been received at Billingsgate within twelve months.

LITERATURE

REAL LIFE IN INDIA. By an Old Resident. Houlston and Stoneman

Lest our readers may be misled by the title of this very useful book, it may be as well to state that it is not a Sketch-book of Scenery and Manners, and Anglo-Indian gossip, of tiffins and tiger-hunts, of lotterings in camp and quarters, a la of Doré and Club squibs—such as form the staple of scores of flimsy volumes purporting to show "Life in India." The volume before us is of a much more real and serviceable character: its author, the "Old Resident," remarks that these are not times in which persons can look out for and relish the merely immediate concerns; and thus he explores how hand-books and guide-books, in octavo, have taken precedence of quarto Histories and ponderous travels. His pocket volume carries economy still further, by condensing in the fewest possible words and the smallest compass, a body of serviceable information not only in relation to the preparation for a visit to India, but to what likewise concerns European "Life in India." Thus we have a brief description of the country, and its Government; the India services—what appointments to get, and how to get them; a chapter specially serviceable to the thousand and one "Old Correspondents" and "Constant Readers" who address us upon such matters during the year. "The Choice of Routes to India" is as minute as Marianne Starke or John Murray upon the Continent of Europe, where every pin-pot kingdom has its "best book." Thus the "Old Resident" gives us preparations for the voyage to India, equipments by ship and overland route; rates of passage-money, baggage-charges; cab-fares across the desert, and transit by dromedary or donkey; and how, by the concerts of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, you may live luxuriously upon turtle and champagne in steam-boat palaces, spin out the journey by being alternately dropped and picked up in Oporto, Lisbon, Cadiz, and Gibraltar (the line, indeed, falling in pleasant places), and at the latter point, as soon as you get tired of its rock wonders and picturesque population, get again picked up by the Alexandria steamer, and thus conveyed to Egypt, where the plagues of the journey begin. However, you are told how to encounter these—how to keep off musquitoes and travelling sharks, and save your three dozen shirts and six scouts and, having arrived in India, you are informed how to travel in the Presidencies, and to live at an Out-station; the latter, by the way, is "bad Life:" made up of tiger and hog hunting, giving fêtes in bungalows that would shame Portland-place in its magnificence, and ruin everybody. All these matters not forgetting money accommodation and "up the country"—are minutely explained; and we have a chapter on health, telling us how best and brought round the Indian life; and the sum of the whole is the abuse of medicine in India has increased the decrement of life one-half per cent. Lastly, come lists of agents, tables of distances, regulations, and precedence; the latter, by the way, an important matter in a nation of nabobs. Altogether we will find in this work a great amount of information, such as is most in requisition among persons interested in India.

THE SOUVENIR OF THE SEASON. THE WAKE OF EXTACY, A MEMORY OF JENNY LIND. By F. W. N. BAYLEY. Willoughby and Co

This is a poetic commemoration of MISS LIND's lyrical triumphs; or, as the author terms it, "an ideal and happy memory of the glorious and gifted being, whose genius crowned, and whose triumphs celebrated, the Summer Season at her Majesty's Theatre." The plan of the work is first, a brief biographic portrait of Mdlle. Lind; and then seven Ideal illustrations, designed by Kenny Meadows, of the Invocation, Alice, Amina, Norma, Maree, Amalia, and Sonnina; all lithographed by Hammerton. To each illustration is appended a poem descriptive of the character represented, and this is written in a vein of genuine enthusiasm and extacy.

PRACTICAL HINTS ON DECORATIVE NEEDLEWORK. By Miss LAMBERT Second Edition Murray

Tapestry, or canvass work, and the Marking and Making-up of Needlework, are the matters treated of in this manual; and those with the precision and distinctness which the subjects demand. Miss Lambert has lately retired from the active duties of the profession, and the little book is a sort of legacy for the improvement of the branch of decorative art, which the author thinks has, hitherto, depended too much on the taste, frequently a false one, of France and Germany

THE DRAWING-ROOM TABLE-BOOK Edited by MRS S C HALL. Virtue

An elegant Gift-book of the season, consisting of Poems by various hands, and Tales by the gifted lady whose name appears in the title-page. The illustrations are from steel-plates, printed on the same page with the letter-press, within a tasteful border. The plates are acknowledged to be selected from the best of a large number at the command of the Publisher: they are not original studies, but are specimens of first-rate engraving, mostly from pictures by masters of the first eminence. The Tales by MRS HALL are distinguished by that naturalness and vivacity, as well as excellent moral aim, for which the writings of this lady have ever been remarkable

LONDON CRIES AND PUBLIC EDIFICES. Grant and Griffith

A little book for the play-room, with portraits of the "Cries," and a view of some public building in the background of the picture. We cannot say much for the artist, who, perhaps, is not aware of the benefit of accurate observation in works of pure art; his plates are scratchy and feeble, and want colouring The descriptive letter-press is scarcely of average merit; for example, of St. Paul's Cathedral "It took thirty-five years building, the expense of which were raised by a duty on coals" such loose writing as this must be prejudicial to the children's minds, and tend to make education almost as much a matter of unlearning as of learning. The best portion of the book is the wrapper, which is an ingenious and spirited design

PHOTOGRAPHY. By an AMATEUR. Folthorpe, Brighton.

This is a popular treatise, designed to afford the reader a practical acquaintance with photography. The instructions appear to be clear and concise, and, briefly; and to be worthy of the attention of all who aim at becoming photographers.

BECHSTEIN'S CHAMBER BIRDS. Orr and Co.

This is a translation of Dr. Bechstein's well-known Treatise on Chamber Birds, an excellent edition of which, marked by several improvements, has been produced, since the author's death, under the superintendence of Dr. Brehm and Dr Lehrmann, of Hamburg. The translation has been ably executed by MR W. C. Shuckard, the naturalist, and who, to the description of each bird, has added observations compiled from the works of British writers on Natural History. There are, also, cleverly engraved heads of the principal birds described; and the work is otherwise produced in good taste

THE HISTORY OF ROME. By MISS CORNER. Dean and Co.

A volume of an educational series, adapted for youth, schools, and families. The principal authorities for the present work are Professor Niebuhr and Dr. Arnold; and with this eminent aid, and her own sensible method, Miss Corner has produced a very serviceable work

TREATISE ON MECHANICS. By J. F. HEATHER, M. A. STATICS PART I World

This work, published in Parts, will, we are informed, when completed, form two handsome volumes, in royal octavo. It will consist of eight books, of which the first four will treat of the first part, and the last four of the second part, of the following heads, viz:—Statics, Dynamics, Hydrostatics, and Hydrodynamics

The first volume, we are told, will comprise as much of the elements of their several subjects as it is generally found practicable to introduce into our elementary seminaries, and similar institutions, in the last four books, the subjects will be severally resumed; and thus it is the design of the author to form a complete and valuable work on the science. Numerous problems will be given, as exemplifications of the various principles deduced, and as exercises for the student; but, no lengthened dissertation upon any particular application of the subject will be introduced, should this, it is hoped, not be found to be acceptable addition to the libraries of students of all classes, whether as an introduction to the principles and practice of various branches of engineering, or to the sublime investigations of physical astronomy

It would, doubtless, be premature to form, from this published portion of the work, any decided opinion respecting the merits of the whole We are enabled, however, to judge, from what is before us, that the work is intended to furnish a philosophical as well as a mathematical treatise on forces: based, if we may so speak, on the labours of Poisson and Duchayla, with some variations and probable improvements. The author, therefore, flatters himself, and we think not without satisfactory reasons, that he has now rendered complete Duchayla's proof of the statical parallelogram The introduction consists chiefly, and of course, of the definitions relative to the science of Statics; and it is necessary

On Tuesday evening Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner had the honour of joining the Royal dinner circle

On Wednesday Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting. His Royal Highness was attended by the Earl of Morton and Mr. G. E. Anson.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester on Thursday, at Gloucester House, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge arrived in town the same day, from her residence at Kew

We are happy to be able to contradict a report which would be received with universal regret, that his Royal Highness the Prince Consort labours under a disease of the lungs. Several frivolous and unauthenticated reports have been going the round of the newspapers to the effect that her Majesty had been bitten by a dog, had established a "military department," and engaged a German physician: they were all unfounded.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY OF GOLD FROM THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.—Another extensive robbery has been committed, under circumstances of a peculiarly mysterious nature, from the Great Western Railway Company. The circumstances, as far as they have been allowed to transpire, are these. A box of sovereigns—it is said amounting to several thousand pounds—was booked on Monday morning at the Paddington station, for the purpose of its being carried by the mail to Bristol, and thence over the Bristol and Exeter Railway to Taunton, to a banker's house in which town it was consigned. The box was deposited in a box of one of the carriages, and was, up to the time of the starting of the train from London, seen properly safe. On the arrival of the carriages at Bristol, the parcels were looked over in the usual mode by the officers of the company, and upon the box in which the bullion had been placed being examined, it was found that the golden treasure had been abstracted by some cutting instrument of the kind. It is said that six persons, having the appearance of gentlemen, occupied the box of the railway carriage next to that in which gold was deposited, and some suspicion falls upon them, as they supposed that they belong to the London swell mob. It is also rumoured that one of the company's guards has been apprehended. The Directors of the Company have ordered a searching inquiry into the circumstances. It is said that a clue has been obtained, which may not only lead to the apprehension of the guilty parties, but will likewise exculpate the principal guard, in whose charge the box was, from any participation in the transaction.

ATTEMPT TO DESTROY A PASSENGER TRAIN.—At the quarter sessions held at Cardiff, on the 8th inst., William Sloan was convicted and sentenced to seven years' transportation, for wilfully and maliciously attempting to overturn a passenger train on the Taff Vale Railway, by removing the rails. The train proceeded at its usual rate, of which apparent security he was aware, until it had gone nine miles from Cardiff, when the engine, tender, and three of the carriages went off the line. Fortunately for the lives of the passengers, the engine went off on the side of the mountain for some time before the line, it was discovered that the rails had been taken up. Had the rails been displaced only a few yards further on, the train must have gone into the river. The prisoner was apprehended on suspicion, and the evidence fully bore out the verdict of guilty.

ACCIDENT TO THE EARL OF POWIS.—On Friday, his Lordship, accompanied by Lord Clive, the Hon. R. H. Clive, and the Hon Robert Herbert, were shooting on the preserves adjacent to Powis Castle; a gun accidentally fired by the elder gentleman fired; the contents of the gun unfortunately struck the Earl, who was standing on an eminence a short distance off, and they lodged in the left side of His Lordship neck, and fell. The noble sufferer was immediately conveyed to the Castle, where medical gentlemen were promptly in attendance. Several of the shots have been extracted, and his Lordship continues to progress favorably.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—Mr. Halliwell, cash-keeper to the Duke of Bridgewater's dock and warehouse at Preston Brook, had been waiting for a short time on the platform the arrival of a train from Crewe to which was attached the up express train, which leaves Liverpool at half-past six, for London, was seen at the distance, and on Mr. Halliwell crossing from one side of the road to the other, the engine struck him on the side and knocked him down. The front wheel guard in front caught his hand, and dragged him for some distance. When taken up his foot was found to be severed, and, besides other very serious injuries, several of his ribs were fractured. The unfortunate man only lived a very short time after the accident

During the alarm caused by a threatened invasion of this country by the French, in 1798, the following singular announcement appeared in the public papers:—"The Bishop of Winchester has sanctioned the whole of the clergy of Hampshire, and especially of the Isle of Wight, to take up arms in the present crisis, and also to do whatever they may think best for the service of their country."

THE GOOSE IN FRANCE.—On the 26th October last a man, named Morel, employed in the iron works of St. Paul de Jarret (Loire), was condemned to six days' imprisonment for a petty theft upon a M. Tardy, who gave evidence against him, and in consequence of this and other misconduct he was not allowed to return to his employment. In revenge for this, Morel obtained a double-barrelled gun, which he carried about with him, openly declaring that one of the barrels he would shoot M. Tardy, and with the other kill himself. In the evening of the 6th inst., seeing M. Tardy seated in his own house, Morel fired at him through the window, struck him in the face, and, believing he was killed, went hurriedly home, where he placed the muzzle of the other barrel under his chin, and blew out his brains. Fortunately the wound received by M. Tardy is not dangerous

MR. LAYARD'S ASSYRIAN DISCOVERIES.

THE following extracts from a recent article in the Journal des Débats show the estimation in which the Parisians hold the antiquities lately discovered among the ruins of Nineveh by our countryman, Mr. Layard, a small portion of which have already arrived, and have been placed in the British Museum. The testimony is the more valuable from the circumstance of the attention which has been attracted by the recent exhibition at Paris of the Assyrian remains, discovered by M. Botta, at Khorsabad. Mr. Layard's drawings, referred to in the extracts, were, on Saturday last, explained by him to a meeting of the trustees of the British Museum, numerously attended, by the Duke of Cambridge, the Marquis of Northampton, &c.

"Mr. A. H. Layard, an attaché of the British Embassy at Constantinople, arrived at Paris last week. He stayed but a few days, being impatient to revisit his country and family after an absence of eleven years spent in traversing different parts of Western Asia; the fame of his important discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh in 1846 and 1847 has already spread throughout the whole of Europe. We feel confident that we shall be rendering acceptable service to our readers by submitting to their perusal the following notice, which M. Felix Lajard, member of the Institute, read on the subject of these discoveries at the weekly sitting of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres on the 24th instant:

"The Academy at its last sitting was enabled to judge from the drawings laid before them by Mr. Layard how greatly the discoveries of that zealous traveller exceed the expectations raised by all the private correspondence and newspaper articles on the subject. And yet the drawings exhibited by Mr. Layard do not constitute one-fourth part of those so ably executed by him on the site of the ancient Assyrian empire. During his very short stay in Paris he kindly consented to gratify my curiosity on the subject, and allowed me to examine, one by one, the 270 drawings which, exclusive of the impressions of inscriptions, are contained in his portfolio. Many of our members, on being informed of this fact, expressed to me their desire to know the impression created in my mind by [illegible] these archæological riches.

"After a long disquisition on some of the religious symbols found upon the monuments discovered by Mr. Layard, M. Lajard proceeds to say: 'As long ago as the year 1825 I stated to the Academy that I felt justified in connecting with the mysteries of Mithra certain bas-reliefs of Persepolis, which, at one time, were supposed to represent Ormuzd, commanding with the evil genii Ahriman metamorphosed into a lion, a bull, or a griffin; and, at another, the King of Persia as the conqueror of a hostile nation, represented under the same animals. My opinion meets with a full confirmation in the Nimroud bas-reliefs (and what is well worthy of remark), more especially in those bas-reliefs which Mr. Layard, from their style and antiquity, thinks to be older than the sculptures of Khorsabad. Indeed, at Nimroud, not only do the Kings appear surrounded by symbols and scenes which incontestably belong to the mysteries of the national religion; but the same colossal figure of one of the Kings is covered with embroidery or painting representing scenes of imitation analogous to those of Persepolis, and in addition to this a multitude of other figures and symbols, which I also find on the coins and cylinders, and which, in my opinion, belong to the mysteries of Mylitta, Astarte, or Mithra. The King of Assyria is here dressed in a costume which leaves no doubt that the intention of representing the remembrance of his initiation into the mysteries of Mithra; and this costume, found in no other Asiatic monument, reveals the Assyrian origin of the celebrated Olympic stole, with which Apollutus, in his Metamorphoses, tells us it was customary to clothe the initiated. Considered as a whole, and in connexion with the numerous cuneiform inscriptions, of which Mr. Layard has brought over copies, the drawings of this traveller combine all the data necessary in order to present an almost complete picture of the religious, civil, and warlike life of the Assyrian Kings, and, at the same time, to make us acquainted with the deeds, exploits, and conquests of the Assyrian Kings, which are themes and beautiful workmanship of their stuffs, and of their tissues, their peculiar mode of arranging the hair, their carrings, necklaces, bracelets, arms, thrones, furniture, vases, and the carriages of war, which ornamented the gardens of the palace, and which will attract the attention of naturalists, besides a lake, in which were kept different kinds of aquatic animals. Considered with reference to the history of art, the bas-reliefs discovered are not less interesting, for they belong to a period which, according to Mr. Layard, would embrace the size or seven last centuries of the existence of the Assyrian empire. It would, therefore, extend as far back as the fifteenth century before the birth of Jesus Christ—that is to say, to a period about 100 or 200 years after the siege of Troy. And even if this date should appear too remote, it must still be admitted that the sculptures of the Assyrian palaces are anterior to the conquest of the Assyrian empire by Cyrus, and that they show how much Greek has borrowed from Assyrian art. The bas-reliefs of the most ancient of the Nimroud palaces are the most perfect specimens of the latter as yet bequeathed to us, and leave far behind the sculptures of the palace at Khorsabad, which so recently were the objects of our wonder and admiration. In the former we find more truth and variety, in the attitudes of the figures, and, above all, more elevation of style and fidelity of imitation, in the animals in the hunting scenes, &c. The lion and panther are remarkable for bearing the horses fearfully exhibit the admirable type of the purest Arabian breed, and may, with advantage, be compared with the most beautiful models left by Greek and Roman artists, and which are now in the Parthenon. When I add that Mr. Layard found among the ruins of Nimroud small figures in terra cotta vases of the same material, or of marble, ornamented with figures, bricks covered with cuneiform inscriptions, and even the cylinders, figure works in metal and ivory, when I say that no less discovered in other places bas-reliefs, entirely coloured, and a small obelisk, covered with 20 bas-reliefs and 300 lines of cuneiform characters; and when I add that during a stay of two days in Mr. Layard's house, he has described most partly sketched many monuments which no European before him had ever visited, particularly a bas-relief, containing more than 400 figures cut in a rock, representing the two inner walls of a castle—when I say, finally, that all the drawings brought from Nimroud by Mr. Layard are executed with a true and profound feeling for Assyrian art, and that he has sent to the British Museum the original of a great number of those selected specimens amongst those our acquaintance with whirl, we owe to him. I shall still but very imperfectly have stated the services rendered by Mr. Layard to archæology, to geography, and to history.

"And I add that, very many years, no traveller has made so many discoveries which can be compared with those of which I have just given so imperfect a sketch? But ought I not here to declare, as I have declared elsewhere, that the most important of these discoveries, that of the four palaces of Nimroud, is, in reality, due to M. Botta? Had it not been for his intelligence, perseverance, and zeal, the palace of Khorsabad would to this day have remained buried under the ten thousand tons of which had already been removed from it by a modern village, and, but for the exhumation of the ruins of that building, Mr. Layard would not have been led to explore the tumulus at Nimroud, which covered the ruins of three palaces of more ancient, and a fourth of recent date, in perfect preservation."

FEE PRISONERS AT LARGE.—If the following circumstance may be mentioned as a trait of the Irish character, it may be likewise regarded as a remarkable one. Last Saturday fortnight, being Christmas Day, the police magistrates at Dublin did not sit at their respective offices; and, not wishing that the prisoners in custody for drunkenness, and various other petty charges, should remain in confinement, they agreed to discharge all, to the number of 100, on their own recognizances, until Monday morning, when they were directed to appear. The value of such personal recognizances could not have been highly estimated; however, every one of the accused appeared to answer the charge for which he or she had been arrested. The magistrates very properly showed their sense of this regard for their promises by inflicting very light punishments

TWELFTH-DAY CUSTOM AT HAVANA.

TWELFTH-DAY IN HAVANA.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent with the sketch of the accompanying Illustration of the Celebration of Twelfth-Day in the capital of the island of Cuba. It was taken by him from a window, in the principal square, Havana, on the 6th of January, 1847. It represents an annual custom—a kind of Saturnalia—permitted by the authorities to the Slaves or Negroes of what they call "Nacion," or Nation—that is to say, those born in Africa.

It is impossible to conceive a scene more truly startling than this one day of noisy liberty given to these Negroes. They dress themselves in their national, and every kind of fantastic costume; and then, with their grotesque music and wild antics, produce a tableau that can be but faintly rendered by the pencil. The whole city, from sun-rise to sun-down, is one confused, horrid din; and it might almost be imagined that all the maniacs in the world had broken loose, and had congregated here, to hold a Carnival.

Such is the curious custom upon Twelfth-Day, or the "Day of Kings," as it is called in Havana.

VALPARAISO.

SOME interesting intelligence has just been received from the Times Correspondent at Valparaiso; among which are the details of a severe earthquake, at about half-past eleven o'clock, on the 8th of October. The shock lasted a few seconds over a minute, and was the severest felt in Chili for sixteen years, although, fortunately, it was not attended with loss of life or of property in Valparaiso. In Santiago, where the shock seems to have been more powerful, some damage to houses resulted, but of no great importance. In Illapel, a town in the interior, near the Cordillera, some houses are reported to have fallen, and one life to have been lost. Perhaps so strong an earthquake never before occurred which was so merciful in its visitation. The vibration of the earth was felt throughout the whole extent of Chili, and at sea, near the coast, as well as in the republic of Mendoza, on the other side of the Andes, where considerable damage to houses is reported to have taken place.

The spirit of railway enterprise has already reached here; though the Bill or the line from Valparaiso to Santiago has not yet reached maturity

Valparaiso is the port of Santiago, and was once the main seat of Chilian commerce. It is situated on a long narrow strip of land bordering a semicircular bay, over which impend on all sides steep cliffs nearly 2000 feet high, and sparingly covered with shrubs and stunted grass. The principal street of the town, about three miles long, runs along the sea, and contains the houses of the most opulent citizens; the lower ranks being huddled in ravines among the hills in the rear. During the summer, which lasts from November to March, the bay affords a safe and pleasant anchorage; but, in winter, especially in June and July, the north wind often blows very violently.

Business is stated, in the Times' letter, to be unprecedentedly dull, though it is expected the causes are only temporary.

"The commercial supremacy which Valparaiso has for the last twenty years maintained over all the other ports of the west coast of South America, owing to the domestic tranquillity which Chili has enjoyed, while the neighbouring republics of Peru, the Ecuador, New Grenada, Central America, as well as Mexico, have been suffering from a succession of revolutionary movements, is rapidly declining; nor is this to be wondered at, when we consider that, great as are the natural resources of Chili, they are far inferior to those of Peru, that Callao possesses acknowledged advantages over Valparaiso as a harbour,—that the voyage from England to the former is only, on an average, one week longer than to the latter port,—and that Peru (now beginning to reap the fruits of the peace which she has for the last few years preserved) offers at least equal advantages as a market for English goods to Chili; while the rapid steam communication with Europe by way of the Isthmus of Panama, places our Peruvian neighbours in nearer contact with the fountain of commercial enterprise. These facts considered, it is easy to conceive why Callao should increase in importance, as it is now actually increasing, and bid fair to become the first commercial port on this side of the continent.

"The immediate cause of the decline of the commercial importance of this port is, however, of domestic origin, and the more to be regretted because remediable by the adoption of an enlightened commercial policy on the part of the Chilian Government.

"Another drag upon the industry of Chili is the heavy export duty levied upon copper and copper ore, the staple of the country, and a great proportion of which is worked by British capital; here, and on silver, the fiscal hand falls heavy. Agricultural produce—wheat, pulse, flour, &c.—are quite free; but these productions belong to another class (the hacendados) who understand quite well the action of an export duty"

THE LATE SAMUEL HAMILTON WALKER,

CAPTAIN OF THE TEXAS RANGERS.

THOSE of mankind who watch narrowly the diversity of human actions, have ever remarked that great events, of either a civil or military character, are essentially necessary to draw into activity the dormant powers of the Statesman, or of the warrior, whose retiring nature counsels him to withdraw from that which should have been his own field of usefulness; thereby preventing the world from acknowledging his ability, from profiting by his talents, and from imitating his virtues.

Among this class must be recorded the name of the late Captain Samuel Hamilton Walker, of the Rangers of Texas. Born near Pansville, Prince George County, in Maryland, about the year 1815, he served as a private in the army of the United States, ably and gallantly, and at the commencement of the war waged against the Seminole Indians, which broke out in the autumn of 1835, and continued about five years.

Persevering and vigilant, energetic and brave, he was, on account of these soldier-like qualities, chosen by Colonel Harney, to penetrate, with a body of valiant, tireless men, the even glades of Florida, where the prints of the foot of the white man never appeared to Indian before

About four years after the close of the war Florida was admitted into the Union; before that time, however, Captain Walker offered his services to General Houston, of Texas, who gladly availed himself of the assistance of one who was "unelated by success, and undiscouraged by defeat," and "whose patriotism was pure and lofty as his character."

This province was annexed to the United States July 4, 1845.

On the 24th of April, 1846, Captain S. H. Thornton, with a party of sixty-three dragoons, who had been sent some distance up the left bank of the Nueces river, became engaged with a vastly superior Mexican force, commanded by Brigadier-General Torrejon, being surrounded, they were compelled to surrender, with a loss of sixteen killed or wounded in the encounter.

On the 24th of the same month, Captain Walker, at the head of a small company of Texas Rangers, endeavoured to proceed from Point Isabel to Fort Brown, but without success. On the day following, however, he succeeded in hearing to General Taylor a communication from Major Munroe, commanding the depôt, advising him that the Point was menaced by a large Mexican force.

THE LATE CAPTAIN WALKER, TEXAN RANGERS.

On the 19th, May, 1846, Matamoras was taken possession of by General Taylor, Anxious to ascertain the strength and position of his enemy, General Taylor detached the squadrons of Kearney and May, and the Rangers of Walker, to follow in pursuit. This detachment was subject to the orders of Colonel Garland

From this period of the war in Mexico, the services rendered by Captain Walker and his brave Rangers, have been of the utmost importance.

After the arrival of General Lane, at Tenoic, Captain Walker joined him with his command, when they advanced together till they reached the town of Dreyes, at which place Captain Walker, by order of the commanding General, took up his line of march to Huamantla, by way of the towns of San Francisco and Guapaulla.

Arriving at that town on the 9th of October 1847, a sanguinary engagement took place between the forces of Captain Walker, consisting of 250 men, and those of the Mexicans, numbering about 900: supposed to be under the command of General Santa Anna.

The Mexicans were expelled from Huamantla, which was occupied temporarily by the troops of the gallant Walker, and those of the valiant and brave General Lane.

Of whom, the former fell in the streets of the town, mortally wounded, by a cannon-ball from a masked battery, early in the action

He was much esteemed, and beloved by those friends who watched, with intense anxiety, his gallant achievements, in the most hazardous undertakings; and now that he rests in the grave of a soldier, his name is respected, and his daring deeds admired, even by the war-made enemy.

TWELFTH-NIGHT ENTERTAINMENT AT THE HANWELL LUNATIC ASYLUM.

TWELFTH NIGHT AT THE HANWELL ASYLUM.

"SEVEN years have elapsed since the experiment of non-restraint has been fully tried in the Hanwell Asylum; and Dr. Conolly, in the spirit of a Christian philosopher, thanks God, with deep and unfeigned humility, that nothing has occurred during that period to throw discredit on the great principle for which he has so nobly battled."

We quote this emphatic testimony to the success of the non-restraint system of management of Lunatic Asylums from the first Number of the Journal of Psychological Medicine and Mental Pathology, edited by Dr. Forbes Winslow; a work specially devoted to the humane treatment of the Insane, and from which the most beneficial results may be anticipated.

The accompanying Engraving presents a very interesting illustration of the non-restraint system pursued at Hanwell. Among the in-door recreations for the patients during the winter days and evenings, music is the greatest favourite. There are three pianos; flutes, clarionets, and violins have been bought for patients who could play. Some of the attendants are tolerable musicians, and a small band has been formed, which contributes much to the enjoyment of the winter evening parties. It is by no means uncommon, on approaching the wards appropriated to the more tranquil female patients, on the male side of the Asylum, to hear a lively performance on the fiddle, and to find patients dancing to it. The patients often have small parties for dancing, and there are some entertainments on a larger scale. One of the latter, given to the female patients, took place on New Year's Eve; and, on the 6th instant (Thursday week,) the usual Twelfth Night entertainment was given to the male patients, in the institution.

They assembled, to the number of about 250, in the gallery of No. 9 ward, and in the adjoining tower, both of which were tastefully decorated with evergreens; coloured lamps were suspended from the ceiling, and the gas-burners were altered so as to appear like ornamental fan-lights; and many devices and mottoes were placed on the walls. At about half-past four o'clock these patients partook of coffee and cake in the above apartment, and all the others were similarly regaled in their respective wards; after which some danced, others sung, some played on various instruments, others amused themselves with cards, draughts, dominoes, bagatelle, &c. At eight o'clock a supper of roast beef and vegetables was served to them, with an allowance of beer and tobacco. At the conclusion of this repast they again engaged in amusements till about half past nine, when, after singing the National Anthem, they retired to bed, in tranquillity and order. Good humour and mirth prevailed during the entire evening, not a single circumstance occurring to mar the happiness which all appeared to enjoy. The attendants were most zealous and assiduous in contributing to the festivity of the patients; and their exertions were, in the highest degree, praiseworthy. All the officers of the Asylum, and several of the Committee of Visitors, were present.

Dr. Conolly has just published a very interesting volume on "The Construction and Government of Lunatic Asylums, and Hospitals for the Insane;" in which we find the following striking passage on these evening entertainments:—

"The first sight of three hundred insane persons, assembled for an entertainment, all stimulated by a lighted and decorated apartment, and the presence of strangers, and the sound of music, and allowed to dance as freely, and even as fantastically, as each may choose, is one which an unfamiliar spectator can scarcely witness without feeling some immediate trepidation. But, in an asylum where kindness is the rule, and where all the officers and all the attendants, and even the visitors, are known to entertain cordial feelings towards the patients, and where the patients are unaccustomed to any kind of violent treatment, or even to sharp or unkind reproof, it is found that a character of order prevails, which is not lost sight of amidst the excitement of the liveliest dancing and enjoyment. What appears to be an almost unrestrained activity is moderated by one timely, kind, and judicious word; and excitement which seems likely to transgress due bounds, is suspended in a moment by friendly conversation. When the hour of separation arrives, cheerful faces and grateful expressions show the general good effect of the indulgences accorded, on which, usually, sound sleep is found speedily to ensue. Such are the general effects; and the especial effects on some of the patients are even more remarkable."

Our Illustration shows at one view the supper and the lively dance. In the latter, the right-hand figure is poor Rayner, many years Harlequin at Covent-Garden Theatre. The reader, by the way, will find a minute account of a visit to the Hanwell Asylum in No. 55 of our Journal.

MRS. MOWATT.

THIS lady, who has just made a successful appearance at the Princess' Theatre is a native of New York, her father being Samuel G. Ogden, Esq.; and her mother's grandfather, Francis Lewis, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. In her thirteenth year, Mrs. Mowatt studied Voltaire's "Alzire," and remodelled it for private representation; and her spirited performance of the part of the heroine is yet in the vivid remembrance of her friends.

After her marriage, Mrs. Mowatt visited Europe, and passed sufficient time in France and Germany to acquire the languages of those two countries. While in Paris, she was a frequent student of Rachel's classical and severe style of acting. While here, Mrs. Mowatt also wrote a first-rate [illegible] of which the American critics speak very highly. In 1845, Mrs. Mowatt wrote a comedy, entitled "Fashion," which was performed at the Park Theatre several nights, with greater success than had attended any other American comedy.

In June, 1845, Mrs. Mowatt made her début on the stage at the Park Theatre, as Pauline, in "The Lady of Lyons;" and, says the New York critic, "we doubt if ever débutante met with success so brilliant and unequivocal." Her Julians, Juliet, Mariana, and Lucy Ashton, are spoken of with equal eulogy.

MRS. MOWATT, OF THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

Mrs. Mowatt has since produced a drama in five acts, entitled "Armand; or, The Child of the People," in which she played the character of Blanche. It was performed with triumphant success during Mrs Mowatt's last engagements in New York and Boston, previous to her sailing for England.

THE THEATRES

Very little has taken place in the dramatic world since we last wrote, the Christmas pieces generally having proved sufficiently attractive to fill the houses without any novelty. A glance, however, at what they are doing, and what they are about to do, may not be out of place.

DRURY-LANE.

On Wednesday evening, Donizetti's opera, "Linda da Chamouni," was brought out at this theatre, for the purpose of introducing three new singers to the English stage. That they did not achieve any remarkable success is to be regretted; since M. Jullien's exertions in producing a perfect opera, sustained by native singers, have been most untiring and praiseworthy. He has already made us acquainted with a number of the finest melodies and most admirable representations with a completeness never before known on our boards. But of the débutantes of Wednesday, we are sorry that we can say but little. They consisted of a soprano, a baritone, and a bass—Mrs. J. Lea, Mr. J. Lea, and Mr. Tonna.

The story of "Linda da Chamouni" is well known to the play-going public as the "Village de Dieu," Madame Albert, in its principal character, drew forth the tears and bandits of hundreds, at the St. James's Theatre, three or four years ago; and seven or eight translations of the piece were afterwards performed at the different minor theatres. The plot somewhat resembles that of "Clari," and the principal part was first played in London by Madame Vestris.

Mrs. J. Lea, who, in a bold flight for a début, undertook the character of Linda, was known a few years ago, in our Concert Rooms, as Miss Susan Hobbs. In the present instance, we fear she has been led to over-rate her powers. The part as regards its impersonation merely, is a difficult one, requiring great powers of acting. The music, also, is difficult; and, to combine the two, and produce an effect in a task of [illegible] practice d'acteur. With Mrs. Lea's execution we have little fault to find, in itself, but the weakness of her voice is such that at times we questioned whether those in a remote part of the house heard a note of it. The area of Drury-Lane is a far different thing to that of our largest concert room; and the singer that might create some effect in the Hanover-square Rooms might also be a cipher on the boards of our "Grand Opera." Not that Mrs. Lea entirely failed; there was much to commend in her performance; but an ear-trumpet, as well as a lorgnette, will be requisite to enter entirely into its merits. Mr. J. Lea, we are sorry to say, is more powerless in singing and acting than the lady; and the recollection of the original representative provoked no very favourable comparisons. Mr. Gregg promises well; but much study is required before he can attain a safe high position. He must get rid of certain mannerisms, at the same time, which interfered with his intended effects. Mr. Santiago, who played the tenor part, (and who appeared in Mr Reeves's character in the "Maid of Honour" last week, at a remarkably short notice,) acquitted himself very creditably. But, for the sake both of the opera-going public and the theatre, we wish the four new singers had created a little more enthusiasm. For the empty clamour which attends a first night's performance may usually be taken in an inverse ratio.

Come we now to the only feature of the night, the acting and singing of Miss Miran, in the character of Pierrotto. We anticipated much from this lady's performance, and we were not disappointed. Her beautiful contralto voice was heard to the greatest advantage; and she gave additional promise of becoming one of our greatest singers—a prophecy already made by those who heard her in the masque scene of "The Maid of Honour." It was fortunate that Miss Miran was included in the cast of the opera; without her aid we scarcely knew what its fate might have been.

The house was well attended, and the audience liberal in their applause, bestowing the customary ovations. But we are not sanguine as to the favour with which "Linda da Chamouni" will be received on future representations. It will serve as an "off night" representation; but that will be all.

We were present at the second representation of the opera, after the above notice was written, on Thursday evening, and feel bound to state that its reception was more gratifying than on the previous night—the new singers appearing to have acquired more confidence, and certainly displaying their powers to greater advantage. We omitted to pay a just tribute of praise to Mr Weiss; his fine voice told with admirable effect whenever he was required to exercise it.

The Pantomime improves considerably upon repetition; and that was out of order, during its earlier representations, now works well, and it promises to enjoy a [illegible]

The HAYMARKET visitors were disappointed on Monday, by a certificate of the indisposition of Mrs. Charles Kean, which prevented her from performing with her husband on the opening, as we announced [illegible] put off until Monday next, when Mr. Lovel's play, "The Wife's Secret," which has never been acted in England, will be produced. The plot is laid in the time of the Cavaliers and Round Heads, and the cast will include Mr. Webster, Mr. Charles Kean, Miss Reynolds, Mrs. Keeley, and Mrs. Charles Kean.

At the PRINCESS', Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport, two actors of Transatlantic celebrity, have appeared with success. The lady is an agreeable person, and plays with archness and spirit, and the gentleman bids fair to be an acquisition to the company. Anew comic [illegible] Mr. Sister's Secret," is said to be very brilliant; it has the merit of a decidedly funny denouement, and is elevated by good writing. Shirley Brooks is the author of the piece.

The houses at the ADELPHI are also very good. "The Pearl of the Ocean" has created its own the holiday audiences; and M. Paul Legrandy's "Italian Peasants," having come down to a "Comic Ballet of Action" in three scenes, is well understood by the audience. Since the improvements behind the scenes, we shall expect great things at the Adelphi. If the management will now be able to bring forth any effects, of the most elaborate kind, this can be introduced into the pieces.

"There is no mistake," to echo the Times, "about Mr. Gustavus Brooke," whose success at the Olympic is decided. Indeed, the enthusiasm created by his performances has been increasing nightly. The [illegible] announces that the Management has entered into a permanent engagement with him. It is to be hoped he remains long enough for a fair trial of his best characters, and especially his celebrity, Othello, [illegible] yet in any minted or "original" parts—the OLYMPIC will once more become an established fact. If Mr. Brooke, however, has any views on the accommodations of the house, we would strongly urge upon him that he insist upon being better supported. At present, every representation is an uphill fight on his part against indifference; and we are not ashamed of the audience to call the "stock" company as talk about, when one is not on the stage, is the best proof of this.

At the FRENCH PLAYS, "Antigone" has been so successful, that her Majesty and Prince Albert have commanded a re-ining performance on the 26th instant. [illegible] of "Diogène," in which M. Bocage performs [illegible] only one hundred consecutive nights at the Odéon, is in active preparation.

SADLER'S WELLS and the SURREY MARYLEBONE and ASTLEY'S are filled nightly with crowded audiences from their respective suburbs.

THE BATH AMATEURS.

It is long since the interior of the Bath Theatre presented so brilliant a spectacle as it did on Tuesday evening, when the amateur performance took place for the benefit of Mrs. Mayo. [illegible] that the pit of the theatre was converted into stalls, and, on the after [illegible] Tuesday, any reasonable sum might have been commanded for the sale of a box.

Several of the performers were from London; many also were residents in Bath; and, to assist them, the services of Miss Julia Bennett and Mr. Anderson were fortunately secured, the latter having given his kind permission for the former lady to appear.

In the [illegible] Mr. Anderson, [illegible] Mr. Lacy Foote (Major Simpson); [illegible] Mr. Lacy, Mr. Hilton), Mr. Anderson (Mr. Mayhew), [illegible] Mr. Mayo), Mr. Martin [illegible] Mr. Cecil Blake); Crabtree (Mr. Mayo), Lovelace (Mr. Charleton), [illegible] Mr. Anderson), Trip (Mr. Lionel Herbert); Rowley (Mr. Hodgson); Lucy Teazle (Miss Julia Bennett); Maria (Miss Rosa Bennett); Mrs. [illegible] (Miss Beaufort); Lady Sneerwell (Miss [illegible]).

It was requested that the audience would be in their places by seven o'clock, at which time every available corner was occupied. The performance commenced with a prologue, written for the occasion, and spoken, by Mr. Albert Smith, which we subjoin:

PROLOGUE.

"When, in the Forum of old Rome, they found
One morn, a mighty Senate in the ground,
As Marcus Cartius to its midst [illegible]
Vowing this opening for a nice [illegible],
And by a massive of his own [illegible]
Insisted, for Rome's early [illegible],
Saying he perish'd for the people's fault,
And made a leap that landed in a vault—
So we, to night, regardless of our fate,
Have come, prepared our lives to immolate,
Not, as they did, with implement worn,
And the wide gulph of empty benches close:
Too pleased to find in this fair railway age,
Some still will entertain the good old stage.

"Yet, understand our aim  We come not here
With the profession's claims to interfere.
Let not our presence the beat [illegible]
Be deem'd a wish to [illegible] the actors' art!
To serve them, in a dull, cold time, we come,
And throw some cheering comfort round their home—
Strive but to make some baby [illegible]
For those who [illegible] so oft delighted us

"Our rashness let the object then excuse—
Kindly receive our efforts to amuse;
Compare us not to those weak-minded souls
Who to Newcastle sometimes carry coals,
By saying we have followed the same path,
In bringing a supply of pumps to Bath!
No! [illegible] teeth the sad reminder fish!
That 'well-met' be, as now, a cause of wrath,
But kindness, to be told to 'Go to Bath.'"

After the comedy an epilogue, sparkling with allusion, written by Mr. Charles Mackay, was admirably delivered, by Miss Julia Bennett. Then followed Lewis Lee's celebrated entr'acte of "Mr. Penn [illegible] Mr. Mayo), a most [illegible] reference to "the old road" between Bologne and Paris, given by Mr. Albert Smith; a farce of comic scenes, by Mr. Arcedeckne; and the performances concluded with the Adelphi "Normal" farce, Sarsaw (Mr. Buckstone), Scaffold (Mr. Cuthbert), Pronoso (Mr. Harley), Clotilda (Mr. Arcedeckne); Polito (Miss Beaumont), Harlus (Miss Ellen O'Hara).

Criticism, in a performance of this kind, is not expected [illegible] Enough, the entire programme gave the greatest satisfaction to a very elegant audience, and that a handsome sum was realized over the expenses. The good city was filled with strangers, every train brought a fresh influx, and the theatre was at a premium. Indeed, we think, on a future occasion, when any object calls for a similar reunion—that the interest would, if anything, be doubled.

THEATRICALS AT WOBURN ABBEY.—Amongst the amusements provided for the distinguished guests by the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, at the annual family meet in Bedfordshire, during the Christmas festivities, was an histrionic exhibition at the "Woburn Abbey theatre." According to the bill, the performances were "in honour and under the [illegible] Queen's Servants, the Ministers Plenipotentiary and Envoys Extraordinary." The secretary acted on the occasion was [illegible] drama, entitled "Our Virgin Queen; or, Too Much Supper," the dramatis personæ being as follows:—Queen Elizabeth, the Duchess Dowager of Bedford; the Duchess of Bedford, Lady Rachael Russell; Sir Nicholas Bacon, Mr. [illegible]; Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. R. Monckton Milnes; [illegible] Lord [illegible]; the Mayor of Ecatil, Mr. Sanford; Mr. Aldermen Scarlet, Lord [illegible]; Sally Scarlet, Lady Rachel Russell; A Friend who Drops in, Mr. Augustus Stafford, M.P. Attendants, Prisoners, Soldiers, Citizens, &c. &c. The entertainments concluded with a "A Mystic Ming," never before acted, never to be acted again. Verses, a grand, contained [illegible] tale and profundity, the Month of December, [illegible] Christmas. It was further announced to those anxious to witness the performances, which subsequently took place, would commence as soon as clarified coffee [illegible] The box-office is not open. There have been no rehearsals, and there is no [illegible] Mr. A Stafford, M.P., created much merriment by the able manner he enacted the humorous part of A Friend who Drops in. Lord [illegible] Russell gave Scarlet, and Mr. M. Milnes, as Sir Walter Raleigh, also ably acquitted [illegible]

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—Mr. Salmon, of Cambridge, has bequeathed [illegible] he noted very handsome sums to the following charitable institutions:—Addenbrooke's Hospital, £500; Victoria Society, £500; Mr. Simpson's Asylum, £500; Sunday School, Barnwell, £300; Lying-in Charity, £100; Samaritan Fund, £100; [illegible] Dispensary, £100; and Blind Institution in Lincoln, £100.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. NAPIER.—A committee of gentlemen formed for presenting a testimonial to Mr Charles Napier for his exertions (as associate [illegible] the Committee of Management) and anxieties in arranging [illegible] Mr. Barnett, Mr. [illegible], and Farr gangs, for depredations on [illegible] age, while exertions [illegible] terminated so [illegible] to the companies as well as to [illegible] the enormous expense to Mr. Napier, have received [illegible] acknowledging the kindness of the committee and the press, but stating that he cannot personally accept of contributions from private individuals, and expresses confidence that the companies whom he endeavoured to benefit will not allow him to suffer further loss in the business."—Globe

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Nor long ago a foreign Nobleman, a member of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, had his vessel seized at Cowes, for smuggling. At the present moment, a foreign nobleman, belonging to a member of the same club, is under arrest at Gravesend, [illegible] of his ultra warlike demonstrations. "When sorrows come, they come not single spies" May we expect, at no distant day, the Squadron will furnish its Red Rover?

With the turn of Christmas, fox-hunts [illegible] with the title of flood. Never was Diana worshipped with more fervour than at this present writing. [illegible] that our country is [illegible] "There was [illegible] canary [illegible] champion; infantry from Weedon; muffs from Leamington; sojourners in Rugby; lawyers from London; our old friend Snob, and old Mr. Last Red Cap, always behind when she ought to be in front, and [illegible] There were jack-boots and top-boots; short legs and long pedigrees, all bone and no blood, and the reverse; long-tails, bob-tails, and rat-tails. Now, had there been no North Warwickshire, this would have been no such scene as that at [illegible]

Shooting terminates with the present month; and, immed [illegible] the season will have an opportunity of amusing themselves with the [illegible] Lords, in the House of Peers. It is to be hoped, if they be merry, they will be wise also. When the existing game laws are discussed, many of the rural members pledged [illegible] come a law, it would be the death warrant of the whole [illegible] of game. It came to pass, [illegible] the enactment, the [illegible] Leadenhall Market ruled pheasants to be the cheapest [illegible] procured in the metropolis. While upon the subject of wild animals, it would be well that rabbits did not overlook the game. If a man must pay his ten shillings for a licence to kill a hare, why may he kill a score for [illegible] There is no subject upon which popular philosophy appears to be so much lacked as that of humanity. A gentleman lately read [illegible] papers, to the effect [illegible] his full-bodied "gents" repaired to a livery-stable-keeper, for the purpose of hiring a horse and gig, to take them to Brighton and back the same day. "What," cried the [illegible] "you [illegible] want to drive a poor beast upwards of a hundred miles in a day?" "Why, sir," said one of the applicants, "We're all gentlemen." A gentleman (who, no doubt, has got a wife, and a pair of spare boots) rode his mare, the other day, from Leamington to London and to death—in less than twelve hours. Persons should [illegible] for their pleasure after a rate suitable to the amount of enjoyment. Why [illegible] charge the sportsman [illegible] as much as the [illegible] for killing a couple of thorough bloods? [illegible] of the Animals' Cruelty School is all at fault!

As [illegible] are cheap in the City, the odds look up at the West End. Various [illegible] nominations are beginning to find friends at the Corner. We shall take [illegible] early soon to speak of the state of the market.

PUBLIC SALES.

MONDAY.—The chief feature of the betting this afternoon was the restoration of Spring Jack, for, although it was [illegible] to 1, the feeling was so decidedly in his favour, that it would have been impossible to "get on" to any [illegible] Beborough was also in great force, and a few scores were laid out quickly on Cossack, Swiss Boy, and Nil Desperandum. In other respects the betting was unimportant.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The difficulty of investing unemployed capital has been [illegible] the present state of the half-yearly dividends, at an extent that [illegible] impossible to find borrowers upon good security, either on the Stock Exchange or Discount Market. [illegible] sums have been offered at 2½ per cent until the 31st inst. The Discount houses are [illegible] sums, with difficulty finding [illegible] cent for small amounts [illegible] This state of things offers a striking contrast to [illegible] of Money Market in October last. At that period cent was paid for short [illegible] and Stock, and the most unexceptionable paper was rejected if tendered for discount. Notwithstanding a great reliance is not to be placed upon the present position of affairs, the general feeling is apparently shared by the Directors of the Bank of England. It was strongly anticipated that a reduction in the rate of interest would be announced from the Bank on Thursday. It was not, however, and the Government would not have [illegible] to the accumulation of capital arising from the small demands [illegible] cent rate of the present state of the money [illegible] calculated to check desirable operations, although it may be a bar to more speculative [illegible] On the other hand, an impetus to speculation [illegible] was chiefly been checked by the high rate of discount, would have been a certain result, and even now, as present rates, may be possibly only postponed [illegible] a sudden return to activity [illegible] must be earnestly desired [illegible] the case of the Bank [illegible] With [illegible] from 13 to 15 per cent. in New York, an efflux of gold may be rationally anticipated, if any [illegible] to the Bank of England [illegible] most distressing results, tarrying back to an indefinite period a return to settled [illegible] It may be therefore [illegible] the Bank has obtained [illegible] and a deliberate course of action been more requisite. [illegible] rapid improving state of the Money Market is likely to [illegible] a more extensive trading, instead of cautious operations. To avoid such temptation is difficult, but the course of safety for some months to come will be to limit credit, and check [illegible] approaching an undue extension of trade.

The [illegible] of the North Western Bank of India still remain unaccepted by Glyn and Company.

A writ of bankruptcy has been issued against Messrs Lesley, Alexander and Company, of Sunderland, shipowners, Mill-farmers. This, of course, takes the estate out of the hands of the inspectors, by whom it was in process of [illegible]

The suspension of Messrs. Cargeill, Headlam, and Co., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, was announced on Friday, with much regret. As brokers, the firm ranked highly, and no speculation, either on the part of partners or clerks, has been [illegible] to account for Messrs Hayworth and Co., of Calcutta, is the cause of their stoppage.

There has been [illegible] buoyancy in the English Market during the week. The opening at the close of the previous week, improved 1 per cent. upon the arrival of the West India mail, leaving off at 8 [illegible] On Tuesday Consols opened firmly, and an immediate advance, which ultimate [illegible] Consols for money, and the closing quotations were 87½ to ⅞. The Bank of England Returns were then 87¼ to ⅞ for Account. A reaction on Wednesday, arising from the prices of the French Funds coming worse from [illegible] Consols for money, and the closing figures were 87½ to ⅞. It is [illegible] apparent on Thursday, a general belief existing that a reduction in the Bank rate [illegible] Bank broker purchases [illegible] induced this belief. The Foreign Market has shared in a slight degree the improvement in the English Funds. Mexican Bonds, 20½ to ¾. Brazilians at a later date leaves quotations [illegible] Portuguese have improved considerably, advancing, [illegible] 23¾ to 24. A marked advance in the price of the dividend-paying lines is the prominent feature in the Railway Market this week. Lard.—The transactions [illegible] of trifling importance to take place since our last report. In prices, no [illegible] alteration has taken place.

Butter.—This article has fallen at value in per cwt, with a slow [illegible]

MARTELLO TOWERS ON THE KENTISH COAST.

COAST DEFENCES.—MARTELLO TOWERS.

SETTING aside the prognostications of "Francis Moore, Physician," or of any other seer, whether employed by the Company of Stationers, or prophesying propria motu, at the Horse Guards, we transcribe a page from the old Almanack of History with respect to our Coast Defences.

At the time when there appeared to be good reasons for believing that France seriously contemplated the invasion of England, the attention of the Government was emphatically called to the defence of such portions of the coast as seemed to present the greatest facility for the landing of a hostile force. As the Kentish coast, from East Were Bay to Dymchurch seemed more specially exposed, a line of Martello Towers was erected between these two points, at a distance from each other of from one quarter to three-quarters of a mile. Other Towers of the same kind were erected on various parts of the coast where the shore was low, in other parts of England, but more particularly in the counties of Sussex and Suffolk. The reason of the Government for adopting Towers of this kind, appears to have been owing to the resistance made by the Tower of Martella, in the Island of Corsica, to the British forces under Lord Hood and General Dundas in 1794. This Tower, which was of the form of an obtruncated cone—like that of a windmill—was situated in Martella, or Martle Bay. As it rendered the landing of the troops difficult, Commodore Linzee anchored in a bay to the westward and there landed the troops on the evening of the 7th of February, taking possession of a height that commanded the Tower. As the Tower impeded the advance of the troops it was, the next day, attacked from the bay by the Fortitude and Juno, but, after a cannonade of two hours and a-half, the ships were obliged to haul off, the Fortitude having sustained considerable damage from red-hot shot discharged from the Tower. The Tower, after having been cannonaded from the height for two days, surrendered; rather, it would appear, from the alarm of the garrison than from any great injury that the Tower had sustained. The English, on taking possession of the fort, found that the garrison had originally consisted of thirty-three men, of whom two only were wounded, though mortally. The walls were of great thickness, and bomb-proof; and the parapet consisted of an interior lining of rush matting, filled up to the exterior of the parapet with sand. The only guns they had were two 18-pounders.

Upon this hint our Ministry appear to have subsequently acted, in ordering Martello Towers to be erected on such parts of the coast as seemed to be most assailable. On the Kentish coast, between East Were Bay and Dymchurch, forty wards of twenty of these Towers were erected. They were built of brick, and were from about five-and-thirty to forty feet high: the entrance to them was by a low doorway, about seven feet and a half from the ground, and admission was gained by means of a ladder, which was afterwards withdrawn into the interior. A high step, of two feet, led to the first floor of the Tower—a room of about thirteen feet diameter, and with the walls about five feet thick. Round this room were loopholes in the walls, at such an elevation that the men would be obliged to stand on benches in the event of their being required to oppose an attack of musketry. These benches were also used as the sleeping places for the garrison. On this floor there was a fire-place, and from the centre was a trap-door leading downwards to the ammunition and provision room. The second floor was ascended by similar means.

METEOR SEEN AT BENARES.

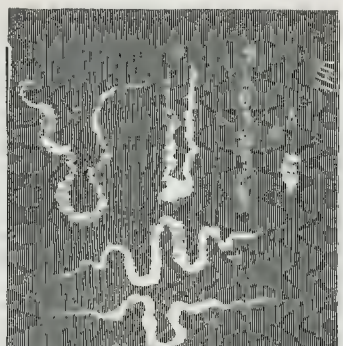
THIS singular and beautiful phenomenon, (of which we have been favoured with a Sketch and details by a Correspondent), was seen at Benares, in the East Indies, on the evening of November 11, 1847, at a little after six. A meteor of great brilliancy suddenly shot up vertically in the western horizon, and burst at an angle of about 30 degrees, or less, and was followed by a luminous streak, like the tail of a comet: it remained stationary and vertical for a few seconds, when it commenced to bend and assume the shape of a snake; it then continued to change its form, as shown in the Illustration, till it entirely vanished. The intensity of its light diminishing as it widened and extended its figure, it moved slowly, perhaps, three degrees on towards the south. The Meteor first appeared at 17 minutes, and disappeared at 26 minutes, past six, P.M.; being visible for a space of nine minutes. "It is at this particular season," says our informant, "that these wonders of nature are most commonly observed; and it was on November 13, 1843, that showers of meteoric lights were seen here, (at Benares), and in every part of the globe."



METEOR SEEN FROM BENARES.

The numbers in the Cut show the various forms the meteoric light assumed from its first appearance till it vanished.

THE "CROSS HOUSE," SOUTHAMPTON.

THIS curious structure, situated on the East side of Southampton, was originally erected for the purpose of affording shelter to the numerous passengers frequenting the ancient ferry across the River Itchen, in the year 1534, during the mayoralty of Peter Claughton, Esq., whose initials, together with the Arms of the town, are carved on a stone built into the angle of the walls of the Eastern compartment. The walls are built in the form of a cross (hence its name), and, from this peculiarity in their construction, they afford a commodious shelter from any wind. At the time of its erection, the ground on which the Cross House stands was a bleak, isolated spot, far removed from any habitations; and tradition assigns the origin of the building to the bequest of a lady, who died from the effects of an illness, caused by exposure to the inclemency of the weather, whilst waiting for the return of the ferry-boat from the opposite shore; but now, in consequence of the construction of a floating bridge at another part of the river, the old ferry is deserted, and the building is no longer of much service. The Town Council, in December, 1846, resolved to destroy the Cross House, on account of its dilapidated condition; but an individual having undertaken the expense of repairing it, the sentence of destruction has not been carried into effect.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Two Tyros."—Black cannot capture the Rook in the case mentioned.

"Argus."—With the most perfect play on both sides, it is now considered that the Rook and Bishop against the Rook tend to a drawn game. Such is the nicety and precision required in the defence, however, that, among ordinary players, the greater force will win in nine cases out of ten. We should call the position you send a drawn battle

"S. H. H." "C. W. R."—Von Oppen's Enigma, 262, is perfectly correct. Do not despair, but try it again and again till you master it.

"E. S." Chess Club, Worcester. The "Chess-Player's Chronicle" returns to its old form of a monthly periodical, at 1s. 6d. per No. The opening No., full of interest and variety, is to appear on the 1st of February.

"Woolwichensis." Your suggestion does not avert the mate. If Black move the Q P, White simply plays the Rook to Q Kt 5th first, and then mates with the Kt next move. The Problem sent is quite unadapted for publication.

"Sopracita."—You have failed in Enigma 247, and must try 250 once more. It is quite practicable, we can assure you.

"Pyro," Leicester.—See our notice to "W. F. S.," in the last No.

"Eta."—The solution of "S. H. W's" ingenious Enigma, No. 219, is—1. Kt to Q 8th; 2. R to Q Kt 2d; 3. B to Q 2d; 4. Kt to K 3d; 5. Kt to Kt 4th; double ch and mate.

"J. Mc. G——y."—Received with thanks

"H. B. B."—1. Your analysis of the opening from Greco has a grave flaw in it. If Black, as you propose, instead of playing his Q Kt to K 2nd, at the 12th move, take the Pawn at Q 5th, White simply checks with his Q at her R 3rd, and then captures the adverse Queen. 2. There is no portrait extant of the gentleman named. 3. Your Problems are always acceptable, and would be doubly so, were they a little more carefully composed.

"A. B. C."—It is an error. The celebrated German player mentioned is attached to the Prussian Legation.

"D. M."—If a player contrives to get one of his Pawns to the 8th square before he has lost any of his pieces, that Pawn assumes the name and power of any piece he chooses, except a King. Thus he may have two Queens, two Rooks, &c., on the board at once.

"Slow and Sure."—A glance at the position must show you that if Black, in Problem No. 206, for his 3rd move, play P to Q 6th, White has only to move his Rook to Q Kt 5th, and then make next move with the Kt, either at K 5th or Q Kt 8th.

"Archimedes."—Sometimes, when there is a great disparity of force between two opponents, one party, placing a cap or ring on a Pawn, undertakes to give checkmate with that particular Pawn, which is called the "Capped Pawn" (Pion Coiffé.) Fool's mate is effected by the second player as follows:—

| WHITE. | BLACK |
| 1. P to K Kt 4th | 1. P to K 4th |
| 2. P to K B 4th | 2. Q to K R 5th—checkmate |

"W. A. T."—We are too much pressed for room to make the deserved distinction which you suggest.

"A. T." Milton Abbey.—Ingenious, but not at all difficult. It shall appear anon among the Chess Enigmas

CHALLENGE TO THE METROPOLITAN CHESS CLUBS.

The following communication has been forwarded to Mr. Staunton by the members of the Chess Club at Amsterdam, with a request that he would exert his influence to promote the match, and add to its interest by taking part in the contest:

"Amsterdam, Jan. 3, 1848.

"The members of the Philidor Chess Club of this city, although fully convinced of the superiority of the leading Chess players of your capital, and having unequal chances of a contest with your Club, but desirous of deriving some benefit from the skill and ingenuity of English players, herewith do themselves the pleasure of inviting your members to a single or double Game at Chess, by correspondence, for a certain stake, the amount of which to be respectively deposited at a London and Amsterdam banker's.

"Should you be disposed to accept this match, we expect to ascertain from you the amount of the stake you wish to play for, and the chief conditions upon which matters can be finally arranged; and request, at all events, an early reply to this communication.—We remain respectfully, your very obedient servants,

"The Committee of the Philidor Chess Club.

(b) He might also have taken the Q Kt P with his Kt.

(c) Cleverly played. It is the instructive termination of this game for which we give it The earlier portion is very recklessly managed by Black.

(d) White has now contrived to imprison the adverse King inextricably.

(e) Taking the P might have afforded Black the means to draw the game.

POPULAR COLLEGES.

A striking article appears in the current number of the Westminster Review, on the ignorance of the working classes in England, and the probable influence that ignorance may have on our future political and social condition. We cannot agree with all the positions of the writer, and must also say that much of the force of the article is derived from exaggeration both of style and fact. Still there is, unhappily, truth enough in it to claim attention. We refer to the paper called "Popular Colleges," it is an earnest pleading for more education for the poor, and of a better sort than has hitherto been attempted, and that not limited to the years of childhood. The mode of securing it, is the establishment of "Colleges," where adults can receive instruction of a higher kind than the mere reading and writing of the ordinary schools, to which only the poor have access for too short a section of their lives. As a statement of the perils which surround us and our institutions, springing from popular ignorance, the following extract is alarming enough :—

"The Bechuanas, the Caffres, the Moors, the Affghans, the Creoles, the Greenlanders, the Mohawks, the Gondoliers, the Polish refugees, the Hybrids of Canada, the Thugs and the Mamelukes, the wild Celt and the untameable Gael, have all successively drawn forth the eloquence or the applause of St. Stephen's ; while, until very recently, it never appears to have occurred to our senators that a process was going forward in every tavern and smithy of the country, that would in a few years put all our institutions into jeopardy, and go nigh to the forfeiture of that glorious estate which our forefathers won, and Providence has so long preserved to us. Such is the present crisis of the national fortunes. Over millions of the working classes several of the lamp-post orators we could name wield an influence far greater than that of the Throne and the Parliament. Not the parochial churches, but the lowly ranters' chapels, or those of the other unendowed and often letterless sectaries, win the very small church-going portion of the operatives of England. The laws are submitted to, rather than approved ; other institutions are tolerated, instead of exciting admiration and gratitude. Capital is regarded as the robber of labour, instead of its patron and brother. Parochial relief is no longer dreaded as a badge. The police are treated as spies, instead of being supported as defenders. Classes are in hostile array. The religious sects are at the red heat of feud warfare. The tavern has become the Englishman's half home ; secret orders are on the increase, and, meanwhile, the great majority of England's workmen can neither read these pages with profitable facility, nor write an ordinary letter of business with the least regard to the proprieties of expression or the laws of grammar."

Have we no consolation under all these afflictions ? Too much of it is true, but, as we above intimate, there is some exaggeration. For instance, the inability to write a letter with a proper regard to "the proprieties of expression, or the laws of grammar," is shared by many rich, and some illustrious men, who have had the best education wealth could purchase. The Duke of Wellington, for example, writes English as Talleyrand said he talked French, "with a great deal of courage," and a soldierly defiance of Lindley

NATIONAL DEFENCE.—THE CHANNEL FLEET—1790.

On the 5th of May, under authority of the King in Council, the Admiralty issued warrants for the equipment of the fleet. Admiral Barrington put to sea with the first division of the fleet on the 26th of June.

In July, Earl Howe followed with another division, leaving 33 sail of the line, including 6 three-deckers, in a forward state of equipment at the different ports

The two divisions, uniting in Torbay, formed a force of 31 sail of the line, including 8 three-deckers, attended by 9 frigates, 6 sloops of war, and 4 cutters : they sailed thence on the 17th of August to the westward.

The fleet was as speedily reduced to a peace establishment, and the noble exertions of the seamen having been acknowledged by a gratuity equal to three months' additional pay, they returned to their former occupations, proud of their important services.

The present agitated question of National Defence has induced us to give a copy of a Historical Picture by Walker, now in the possession of the Vice-Admiral of England, Sir Thos. Byam Martin, G.C.B., painted from a sketch taken at the time by an officer of the fleet, as a proof of what England did in the year 1790 ; and if England with limited, or rather comparatively limited means, in those days could make so noble an effort for either offence or defence, placing this country, as that armament did, in a position to defy all Europe, we have no fear but if the time should arrive to call for similar exertions, neither men or ships will be wanting to replace the distinguished names recorded in this Picture. But there is a moral attached to the incident we record that should not be lost sight of : the very expedition with which this fleet was equipped saved the country from a war, the cost of which, in men and money, is beyond the power of human calculation. It also proves (if proof were wanting) that to maintain peace under the existing state of civilization, we must not neglect the means of war, and which means this country possesses beyond that of any other in the world. This is not altogether in her public establishments, which in many essentials are far more deficient than any of the great European powers ; but will be found in those unexampled instances of private enterprise where machinery adapted to the manufacture of all the matériel of an army could in two months supply more than the entire national establishments of Europe ; and, with this fact, we submit that a well-considered plan of training our militia, and the people employed in the ports and coast of the island, with steam block-ships, in combination with our railways, a body of artillery, the arm most to be relied on (but most wretchedly deficient), is all we require to place ourselves in a position to render it impolitic for any country in the world to try our strength at home.

Murray. The Marquis of Londonderry's epistles do not bear parsing. We could select other members of the Peerage who could not be trusted with a pen with the certainty of using it like a sel[illegible]n. So far, the working men of England need not be reproached; in proportion to their numbers and their means, we believe they can produce readers and writers enough to rescue them from censure. In this point, the writer confounds two things that are not identical. Literary ability is an art, not a virtue; it may be wholly absent in the possessor of clear judgment, shrewdness, skill in his vocation, and the best moral qualities. On the other hand, the greatest acquirements do not always save a man from the deepest social degradation. Among the outcasts of London, driven to herd with the very dregs of the population, may be found persons to whom the best education has been given in vain. It is moral not intellectual strength that is wanted in such men; all the help that could be given would not raise them above the level which they have sunk. The great question is, how can the moral power and energy be imparted both to individuals and classes? The problem is of the most awful difficulty, and in popular education alone we shall not find the whole solution. Before proceeding further, we give another passage from the same article ...

"The clergy will inform such as hold a higher estimate of the mental condition of our operatives, that their congregations consist almost entirely of the middle classes. From the pawnbroker they may learn to how great an extent the plagues of poverty and crime, reproducing each other, have penetrated into the body of the people, a very large proportion of whose Bibles, Sunday clothes, wedding-rings, and those humble trinkets that keep alive some taste in the cottage, are in constant pledge. The brewers can attest that their vats are kept in profitable activity by the hordes who live within a week's labour of starvation. The gin palaces derive their flaunting finery, the silburies of their proprietors, their pretty barmaids and smart waiters, from the multitudes who quaff their liquid fire with the price of their children's breakfasts, ... their wives' garments. The vendors of pestiferous publications ... inform our evidence ... hers, that the vilest trash that ever brav[illegible] decency in print all goes to the cottages, taverns, clubhouses, and shops of the poor. At the police station, they may also learn that the educated disorderly is scarcely one per cent. of the prisoners. ... "It is not too much to say that the majority of the working classes of this country are in a more generally degraded state than the Flatheads of the prairie, or the recently extinguished Mandans, the freebooters of Port Natal, or the shrewd outcasts of the human race in New Zealand."

Here again we must join issue on some points; giving up intemperance to the strongest denunciation that can be passed on it, we ... that the majority of the working classes of England have sunk so low as this; the very work they do, what they produce day by day, contradicts the idea of such physical and mental degeneracy; society could not exist for a year ... race" had so retrograded. It is merely the exaggeration of a clever enthusiast riding his theory to the extreme bounds of common sense. Nor is it true that "trashy literature" is exclusively the literature of the poor. Most of the peculiar class of works alluded to are published at prices that prove their sale is not among the poor. The one licentious newspaper of the London press singularly enough ... ially of the aristocracy, ... connexions, or the wealthy classes. When talking of ... the source ... evil, we ought to recollect how many ... existence are given among those who have certainly ... educated. There are vices and flaws in the mental construction that education does not cure. Who, for instance, buys the works on astrology, in which alone a large publishing trade is driven in London? They have buyers, readers, and believers, who are not poor, for comparatively speaking these books are expensive. Among the wealthy there is no lack of superstition; the very last work reviewed in the Morning Post is a defence of the belief in ghosts and apparitions. But the ignorance and superstition of wealth, and ... education, do not lead ... crime; why? Why is an educated man rarely found an inmate of a prison, or in the list of "disorderlies?" is it because he is educated merely, or because he is rich and exempted from ... tless temptations? But that the teaching of the people is altogether inadequate we fully agree; to the thousands who, as soon as their limbs and sinews are formed, must devote them to toil, education in childhood is an impossibility. The only substitute is, placing the means of mental improvement within reach of the adult workman; and "popular colleges," without the parade of academic ... dour, are practical, and worth the trial, especially as existing ... unions seem to be breaking down. To the following positions ... [illegible]

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE BANK CHARTER BILL. The Earl of Eglintoun, Lord Lieutenant of the county, has convened a meeting, in consequence of having received a requisition of the gentlemen of Ayrshire, to be held on the first instant, for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament to rescind the acts to regulate the issue of bank notes passed in the sessions of 1844 and 1845, in so far as they restrict the paper circulation of the United Kingdom.

MEETING OF THE HOP PLANTERS OF KENT.—On Thursday (last week,) at a meeting of the hop planters of East and West Kent, held at the Star Hotel, Maidstone, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for the repeal of the Excise duty on home-grown hops, a resolution was passed to the effect that the duty on British hops, affecting, as it did, one particular class of agriculturists, was partial in its operation, and oppressive in its character; and a petition to Parliament was likewise resolved that a memorial be presented to the Lords of the Treasury by the members of the county, and that the members for the several boroughs in the county be requested to give it their support.

ALTERATION IN THE LIVERPOOL SHARE MARKET.—At a meeting of the shareholders, on Friday (last week), it was agreed that meetings of the Stock Exchange be held on future twice every day, except on Saturday. The object of the meeting will be from half-past two to three o'clock. This alteration has been rendered necessary by the electric telegraph. There will be two lists published daily.

THE Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce has petitioned, with one dissenting voice, against the Game Laws. On the first introduction of the subject, the Chairman held that it did not fall within the scope of the Chamber, as it was not connected with commerce and manufactures. Mr. Cowan, M.P., maintained that, as game destroyed crops, it was quite legitimate in the Chamber to entertain what limited the supply of human food, and the view was adopted by the meeting.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.—A rather singular phenomenon happened in the neighborhood of Lerwick, in Scotland, a few days ago, and in trying to account for it the people have been a good deal puzzled. Some ascribe it to the wind, some to the rain, some to lightning, and some to an earthquake. It took place on the 5th of last month. The surface of a peaty declivity, to the extent of about 300ft. long and 80ft. wide, has been precipitated into the flat below, and all around the ground has been cracked and rent. The surface consisted of a pretty solid moss, about 6ft. deep, and rested on a hard impervious bed. It seems that the rain fell on the surface, sinking down to the hard soil, and not able to get further, had there softened the moss, making it slippery and soft like butter. This bed having come to passing at the time, and observing the circumstances, immediately secured the parties, and conveyed them to the station house. They were brought up to the public office for examination on Saturday, but they were remanded to a future day.

AFFRAY WITH POACHERS.—An inquest was held on Monday last before Mr Reed, the Coroner for Northumberland, at Morpeth, on the body of Philip Wallis, who died in Morpeth Gaol on the preceding day, in consequence of injuries received under the following circumstances:—On Christmas Eve the deceased with some other persons were poaching near Rywell, when they were observed by one of the gamekeepers, who set his dog at them, which, being a strong, furious animal, rushed at the poachers, who were armed with guns. One of them fired at the dog, and thus alarmed the other keepers on the estate, who hastened to the spot, and a regular affray commenced. Ultimately, the keepers succeeded in taking two of the poachers into custody, and the others ran off. The two who were captured were taken before the magistrates and committed to Morpeth Gaol, where one of them (Wallis) died from the effect of the injuries he had received in the desperate encounter. The jury, after a long investigation, returned a verdict against George Thompson, the other poacher, of "Manslaughter."

CONFESSION OF MURDER. Within the last few days, rumours have been rife that a mason residing in Douglas, Isle of Man, who was not expected to live, had sent for one of the ministers of the town, for the purpose of making a confession of murder; as he felt that he could die without peace of mind unless the murder was said to have taken place some eleven years ago, and was perpetrated by three parties, one of whom struck the unfortunate man with a mason's hammer, and afterwards threw him into Douglas Harbour, where he was found dead next morning with his skull fractured, but which was supposed to have been occasioned by a blow against a vessel at the time of his fall. The man said to be murdered was Robert Cannon, of the parish of Marown, who was very well known throughout the island.

EXTENSIVE FRAUDS IN GOLD BARS.—On Saturday morning, a respectable-looking young man, by the name of Thomas Wallis, was brought before the sitting magistrate at the public office, Birmingham, charged with fraudulently cutting off assay marks affixed to bars of pure gold, and affixing them to a spurious metal which he sold as genuine to Messrs Aston and Co., the well-known bullion merchants of that town. The frauds committed by the prisoner already detected are said to amount to upwards of £1500. The prisoner was remanded.

SPECIAL COMMISSION IN CLARE.

James Hayes and Patrick Ryan were, on Thursday, (last week) found guilty of the wilful murder of Mr. James Watson, at Ballycorney, on the 17th of May last.

Sentenced to be hanged, the 5th of Feb.

Several less important cases, such as "appearing armed," "attacking dwelling-houses," &c., were disposed of on Friday, (last week,) and the parties convicted were sentenced to different periods of transportation or imprisonment.

CAPITAL CONVICTION.—Richard Butler and William Harrington, both men about 40 years of age, were, on Saturday last, found guilty of having, upon the 6th November, 1847, at Gurtnalick, in this county, wilfully and feloniously murdered one Patrick Deary. Sentenced to be hanged on the 5th of Feb.

The trial with which the Court was occupied on Monday is regarded as one of the most important of those that have been tried under the Commission. It was that of a man named Crowe, belonging to the better class of farmers, for procuring the murder of Mr Watson by hired assassins. He was found guilty. Sentenced to be executed on the 18th of February.

The Judges returned to Ennis on Wednesday morning, and the three following days were to be occupied with cases there. On Monday next the Commission for Tipperary will be opened at Clonmel, but it is expected that all the business will be over by the end of the same week.

REMOVAL OF CONVICTS.—The several convicts sentenced to transportation during the sitting of the Special Commission in the county of Clare were removed handcuffed and in chains, as soon as the Court rose, to Limerick, en route for the metropolis. They were tied, on cars, having been taken direct from the Gaol over two to bid them farewell, but the great majority seemed to be totally deserted by friends, if they had them, and also by their connexions in iniquity, who most probably did not wish to come into close proximity with the author ties.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the close of the usual weekly meeting in Conciliation Hall, on Monday, the weekly rent was announced to be £105.

IMPRISONMENT.—The Nenagh Guardian.—Numbers of small farmers, holders of [illegible] acres and under, both in Meath and in the adjoining county of Cavan, have already commenced to make preparations for the spring emigration, by disposing of whatever interest they possess in their farms. It is anticipated that the spirit of emigration will this season be very widely diffused; in fact, it is no longer confined to the struggling farmer or the bankrupt trading man: there are numbers occupying a most respectable position in society, to whom such thoughts a short time since were foreign, but who now begin to cherish the prospect of doing more in America or the colonies than they can ever hope to accomplish at home. This spirit, if widely extended, as we have every reason to believe, will prove highly detrimental to the country, and is of itself quite sufficient to prove the retrogressive state of every class of the community. So long as [illegible] was partial, or confined exclusively to the small handholder [illegible] and above, its effect upon our condition was slight and unimportant; but when such a movement is visible amongst those who possess capital and resources, it augurs badly for the prospects of the future, and it is time for every man to ask himself "Is it good for me to stay behind?"

SUICIDE OF A SURGEON.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest on the body of Mr. Henry W. Bexhall, surgeon, aged 36, late of 74, Upper Seymour-street, Euston-square. Mr. Aldridge, surgeon, of Upper Seymour-street, said he had known deceased five or six years. He was formerly in practice in Melton-street, Euston-square, subsequently in the Mornington-road, and had resided a few months at Upper Seymour-street. On Friday evening a young woman with whom deceased lived asked him to come and see Mr. Bexhall, as he appeared ill. Next day he went to see him, and on entering his apartment found him standing near the fireplace with his throat cut. On seeing witness, he exclaimed, "Ah, it's no use, I have done it effectually." Witness went towards him, but deceased ran round the table, and struggled with him violently, and threw witness over a box. The blood was spouting profusely all this time from his neck. It was some minutes before witness could secure him. He then tried to stop the bleeding by pressure on the vessels of the neck, and called for assistance. Deceased still struggled violently, and called out for prussic acid to finish him. He struggled violently to die last to prevent any attempt to save his life, and died in about a quarter of an hour from the time witness first saw him. He had made a cut with a razor, which lay on the carpet, on the left side, dividing the carotid artery and all the larger vessels. Deceased was of a nervous temperament, and drank at times. He was very strange in his manner, and had told witness that he suffered from delirium tremens. The Jury returned a verdict of "Insanity."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY

A serious and fatal accident took place on Friday night (last week) on this line, at a place called Brookwood, in the parish of Frimley, about a mile and a half beyond the Woking station.

The train which leaves Southampton for London at 8.30 P.M. proceeded as far as the Farnborough station without any delay. Immediately on arriving there, shortly after leaving that station something was found wrong with the engine, and on arriving at the point mentioned above the train came to a standstill. To prevent accident the second guard, Jeremiah Mackland, was sent down the line to establish his red lamp as a token of danger to approaching trains. In the meantime, the engine driver, David Markland, who was considered one of the best and steadiest drivers on the line, being a father as well as a driver, proceeded to examine the engine, and having discovered that the eccentric strap was broken, endeavored to repair the injury. While so engaged, a luggage train was observed by the approaching, and Markland, observing that the latter had not seen the red light, and to call to the various passengers to resume their seats, as he had just finished and should be enabled to proceed in about five minutes. Many of these did so; and immediately afterwards, Markland, with the whole of the goods train ran into the back of the passenger train, and drove it forward with considerable force, crushing poor Markland to death on the spot. Some of the passengers were injured; and the stoker of the passenger train, Thomas Calvert, and Fortescue, the guard of the goods train, were very severely wounded. On arriving at Nine Elms, Fortescue and Calvert were conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital, when it was discovered that Fortescue had sustained a compound fracture of the left arm, and several very severe contusions of the scalp. Calvert had the index finger of his right hand destroyed, so as to render immediate amputation necessary, his knee fractured, and some severe contusions upon his head; but at the last accounts he was proceeding very favourably, and no doubt is entertained of his recovery.

Amongst the passengers the principal sufferers were the Rev. Mr. Hutchins, of Atherstone, Stoke-upon-Trent, fracture of the thigh; Miss Hutchins, severely cut in the forehead; the Rev. Mr. Hichings, arm much contused; Mrs. Hichings, several contusions, and shock to the system; and Mr. Fortescue, jun. of Fortescue, gentleman, slightly injured. Four or five other passengers were also slightly injured by the broken glass, and by being thrown from their seats. The Rev. Mr. Hutchins, when handed up, was set on Saturday, is in a fair way of recovery, as are also the other passengers.

JUDICIAL INQUIRY

On Monday, at the Lambeth Police Court, three of the servants of the Company were, by order of the Directors, charged with having by their negligence caused the collision.

The prisoners, upon being placed at the bar, gave their names Samuel Brownsmith (guard), William Jones (engine driver), and Lewis Fleming (fireman)

The above details having been deposed to, Mr. Elliott said he did not see that there was anything in the conduct of Brownsmith to justify his detention, but the other prisoners he should remand until a future day

INQUEST

On Monday, also, an inquest was held at the Railway Hotel, Woking, before Mr. Woods, Coroner for West Surrey, on view of the body of David Markland, the engine-driver, who was killed by the collision. The inquiry was adjourned until the presence of James and Fleming at the proceedings could be obtained.

The unfortunate man Fortescue is in a precarious state. On Monday night it was found that mortification of the arm had presented itself, and the immediate removal of the limb was decided on, as the only chance of saving his life. Mr M'Mardo accordingly took the arm off just below the shoulder joint. Thomas Calvert is progressing favourably

During Monday night, the offices belong to his Grace the Duke of Bedford, in Pavistock, were broken into, and the sum of £24 9s. stolen. Mr. Phillpps, head clerk to the office, deemed, on Monday night, that his money was not secure; and so strong was the impression on his mind, that he took it to Lewis's, and went to the office, where he found everything in confusion. He immediately gave notice to the police; but up to this time the parties have not been captured.

FIRE AND DEATH OF LIFE ON GLASGOW.—Shortly after midnight on saturday, (last week), a man, in a state of inebriation, was taken into the small cell [illegible] to the station-house, adjoining the Town-hall, in the High-street. Either owing to some mischievous conduct, or from some other cause, the prisoner manufactured the bedding or mattress upon which the man lay ignited, and the result was, that the cell was "burned out," and the prisoner lost his life by the fire.

FIRE IN ST. GILES'S.—On Sunday morning, between one and two, a fire was discovered with a lamentable loss of life, in the house No. 2, corner of Denmark-street, the tenure of Mr J. Powell, wine-cask and bottle-merchant, carrying on business at 37, Crown-street, St Giles's. Owing to the exertions of the firemen, the flames were extinguished, and until that portion of the premises in which the disastrous event was formed.

OMNIBUS ACCIDENT.—On Sunday evening Mr. Charles Davis, in the Strand, immediately opposite Exeter Change, in the act of crossing from an omnibus and sailors to launch a boat to the vessel, but ineffectually, the sea swamping that boats at every endeavour. Every one belonging to the unfortunate craft perished. she was the Thomas, from Whitby to London, with a cargo of coals. The previous, a schooner belonging to Newcastle, was wrecked on the Whi... She struck on the other side of the bank, filled, and immediately went [illegible] crew contrived to take to the boats and reach the shore in safety. She was valued at £700. Her name was the Six H's to the Queen, and she belonged to Lowestoffe. Three vessels are supposed to have been lost on the banks and the entrance of the river of Dundee during Monday night, from papers picked up, one appears to have been the Inchtarvie, from Whitstable; and from a boat washed ashore, another is presumed to be the David and Robert, of Arbroath. [illegible] dry record the crews (20 in number) have perished.

EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCE.—One of the most extraordinary preservations of human life under circumstances of extreme peril lately occurred in the Bristol Channel. At twelve o'clock on the night of Monday, the 14th of [illegible], a young man named Lutton, of Cardiff, a joiner, was standing upon a scaffold, engaged at work on the Duncan Rocks, a vessel at anchor in the channel, near the Flat Holmes, for the purpose of being repaired. The scaffold was not strongly formed, and Lutton suddenly found the plank on which he stood sink under him, and he was precipitated into the water from a height of 40 feet. He sank to a considerable depth; and, on rising to the surface, called loudly for assistance. He soon got astride on a piece of the scaffolding, which was nine inches wide, on each flank, and eighteen feet long. On this he was carried down channel, continuing his cries for help. The mate of the vessel, who was in bed, heard him—ran upon deck—got the boat down, and, with three other men, followed the poor fellow down the channel, being guided by his cries. He says that he passed scores "of vessels" in his dangerous course, but saw no appearance of any effort being made to assist him, although he cried out as loudly as he could. However, after a search of two hours and a half, he and his wife, the mate and his courageous assistants overtook him, and he was taken on board in a dreadful state of exhaustion; at half-past five in the morning the party succeeded in regaining the vessel. Lutton was carried down at least fourteen miles! The weather was exceedingly boisterous

STEAM BOAT EXPLOSION IN THE UNITED STATES. The steamer A. N. Johnson, bound to Wheeling, lately blew up with a tremendous explosion near Maysville, Kentucky, from some unascertained defect in her mach nery. Between 60 and 70 persons were killed on the spot, and a large number scalded, of whom some 30 are so horribly injured that their recovery is considered impossible. So rapid was the progress of the flames after the explosion, and so complete the devastation, that hardly an effort could be made to save preservation. The boat was soon in ashes after fire and burned to the water's edge. The number of passengers on board the A. N. Johnson when this appalling accident occurred was 160, not more than one-quarter of whom escaped injury. So dreadful an accident has rarely, if ever, occurred on the Ohio. Persons in the vicinity of the disaster did all in human power to relieve the sufferers, but so sud was the [illegible] that hardly every effort was useless.

EXPLOSION OF A LOCOMOTIVE. A most serious accident took place on Friday (last week), at the Carlisle and Maryport railway station, by one of the locomotives exploding, and destroying the [illegible] portion of a building called the engine shed, and injuring two persons. The locomotive was standing underneath the shed, preparatory to taking a passenger train out, the engine-driver and stoker examining the machinery at the moment. Both men were much [illegible], but, fortunately, not dangerously. The force of the explosion propelled the engine along the line at an enormous speed; had a passenger train been in its way, the consequences would have been most disastrous. The Directors have since caused an investigation into the accident, and have ascertained that the explosion arose through both safety-valves being tightly screwed down. The boiler exploded just above the fire-box, and near the tender.

MURDEROUS ATTACK. On Friday (last week), at a little past midnight, three men attacked [illegible] in charge of the office and lock of the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, [illegible] near Wigan, and who also, at the time, was under his care a considerable sum of money. For some time he fought with them most determined spirit, and so far succeeded as to cause a rather hasty retreat before the office door was and he carefully examined. The thieves having taken possession of a bag of money, were leaving the office, when the watchman followed them out, armed with a poker. One of the party here seized an axe, and another pistol and [illegible] the watchman to the ground. The watchman bodily lifted and disarmed the villain, therefore two, however, to his assistance, Molyneux was overpowered and much beaten. They afterwards threw him into the canal, in a deep part, and [illegible] of the [illegible] had he not fortunately been a good swimmer, he must have [illegible]. The villains then escaped, and Molyneux, after swimming some distance, got out of the water. We understand that the thieves, in their hurry out of [illegible] left behind them a bag of gold of more value than the one taken, and which, had a careful search been made, could not have escaped observation. A boat had passed the lock only about five minutes previous to the attack.

THE NEW ROYAL MARINE BARRACKS, WOOLWICH.

NEW ROYAL MARINE BARRACKS, AT WOOLWICH.

THIS extensive pile of buildings has been designed by Mr. J. T. Crew, in conjunction with Sir W. Denison, now Governor of Van Diemen's Land. These new barracks have cost £100,000; they will accommodate 1150 men (officers included), with every convenience for cleanliness and comfort. A novel feature in the plan is that a kitchen or mess-room is appropriated for every 40 men, apart from their sleeping-room—an advantage which is not possessed by any other barracks in the kingdom.

The rear buildings, forming the boundary to the plan, contain extensive lavatories, bake-house, wash-house, laundry, bath-room, music-room, butchers' and sutlers' shops, and cleaning sheds. Beneath the barracks, and running the entire length of the building, is a tunnel 20 feet in sectional area, into which warm air is forced, after passing between metal chambers heated by hot water; and from this tunnel a flue is carried into each room, with an exit flue for the foul air near the ceiling line. There are roomy corridors to the barracks, and covered ways, which give every advantage for drilling men in wet weather. Contiguous to the main building are schools for 100 boys and 100 girls; baggage stores for officers and men; stabling for officers; cells, guard-room, and magazine.

The officers' quarters and the mess department form the two sides of the front quadrangle.

The entrance gate, with the officers' library, guard-room, and drill sheds, are not yet complete.

The contractors for this work are the Messrs. Rigby of Westminster; and the whole has been executed under the superintendence of Mr. Crew.

LORD BACON'S SPOON AND FORK.

(From a Correspondent.)

MANY years ago, a friend gave me the following account of Lord Bacon's Spoon and Fork, then in his possession, and which I afterwards saw:—This valuable relic of one of our most eminent Chancellors, is of three materials—gold, silver, and glass; and is so contrived that to the fork may be attached a bowl, by which is formed an elegant and useful spoon. The bowl is of silver, and is fastened to the two prongs of the fork by four silver loops, through which they pass. The handle of the fork is of glass, set in silver, which is joined to the prongs by an ornament of gold; and at the top, modeled in gold, is a boar, the crest of Lord Bacon. The length of the fork, inclusive of the crest, is five inches, and the circumference of the bowl seven inches. The entire weight is 594 grs., or 1 oz. 4 dwts. and 18 grs.

Since the above account was written, this interesting memorial has passed into the hands of Mr. Basil Montagu, the editor of the best edition of Bacon's works.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE LOSS OF THE "AVENGER."

The following extract from a letter from Mr. Larcom the gunner, to his wife, describing the loss of the Avenger, presents the catastrophe to the view with far more of its dreadful reality than any other account hitherto given:—

"I jumped out of bed, and began to feel for my clothes, but a very heavy sea striking the ship bore her entirely on her beam ends. I ran on deck without my clothes, when I was ordered to get the cutters lowered, but there was such a dreadful sea that not a man would clear away the boats. At last, some of the officers, together with myself and the captain's steward, lowered one, and myself and seven others shoved off from our ill-fated ship with hopes that we should be able to render some assistance. We had hardly shoved off when the mainmast went over the side, taking with it the funnel and mizentopmast, which fell inboard, and must have killed a number of men. A minute or so after this the foremast and bowsprit went, leaving the ship a total wreck in less than twenty minutes. All this time the wind and sea were driving our little boat away from our ill-fated ship, which we lost sight of in less than an hour and a half, and in this time the wind blew a gale; and I then began to inquire who was in the boat; when, to my sorrow, I found that I had not a man in the boat who could do a thing. It came on to hail and rain in such a way that I thought we should have been sunk; one moment we were on the top of the mountain wave, the next seemed the bottom of the sea. Expecting every second to be our last, we were all praying for daylight, and at last it came, bringing to our gaze all the horrors of the previous darkness. I then took a glance at my ill-fated companions. Oh! what a sight to see! Four of the eight lying lifeless, or nearly so, at our feet, the wind still increasing, and the sea running mountains high, which broke over and nearly filled us a great many times. At last land appeared right ahead, and our little boat was tearing through the sea. We made out the land to be the coast of Barbary; we were forced to run right for the land. It was now about ten o'clock, and I found my eyesight and strength leaving me. Our boat was nearing the shore at an amazing rate, and when within a few hundred yards of the land was capsized, and four sank to rise no more, the other four reached the shore, and fell senseless on the beach, but, coming to our senses, we got up and commenced walking, we knew not whither. At last we fell in with an Arab, who took us to his hut, and gave us some warm milk, which brought us to our right senses, when we tried to make him understand we wanted to get to a place where we could get a vessel to take to the assistance of our lamented shipmates. We got a vessel ourselves, after travelling one hundred miles, which we did in two days, with our faithful Arab for a guide; but, I am sorry to say, when we got to the place where our ship ran on shore, she was gone down, and every soul had perished, being in all 296 persons."

"The loss of the Avenger and steamer has filled the squadron in the Tagus with despair, as it was but a few weeks since she formed one of its best ornaments. The old Admiral suffers deeply under the affliction thus unexpectedly fallen upon him, as, though the captain of the Avenger was not his child, he was the son of Lady Napier by her first marriage, and he changed his name when adopted by Sir Charles. The other officers were better known here, as Captain Napier only joined a few days before her departure, and I can say of my own knowledge that a more noble-minded gentleman-like set of young fellows were not in the service. It is fortunate for the honour of the navy that the Avenger was provided with Mediterranean charts, as she was ordered to Gibraltar for the very purpose of procuring them, none being obtainable in this squadron; and I have seen a letter, written the day before her leaving that place, in which a superior officer says, 'We are to have the charts to-morrow.' I am particular in mentioning this circumstance, as I have heard it argued that the ill-fated ship was lost for want of proper charts, her captain not having had much experience in that rank, and the master having, as I am told, been some time on shore. Several persons were transferred from the Avenger to other ships in the Tagus immediately before sailing, and I am glad to give their names for the satisfaction of their friends: Captain Ducres, at present of her Majesty's ship St. Vincent, Mr. Hjalmer Owen, midshipman; Mr. D. Sibbald, clerk; Mr. Walter J. Arnold, naval cadet; William Thorpe, captain's steward; Thomas Matthews, cockswain, John Jones, cockswain; William Allen, steward; Mr. Charles H. Jones, paymaster and purser; William Henry Deacon, steward; Henry Cloke, seaman; and William Willis, boy, first class." Lisbon Correspondent of the Times.

LOSS OF H.M. SLOOP "SNAKE."—The United Service Gazette has published a letter from one of the officers of the above-named vessel, giving a detailed account of her total wreck in the Mozambique Channel, on the 29th of August last. The crew has been saved.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—Rear-Admiral Sir James Alexander Gordon has waived his promotion to the rank of Vice Admiral, to enable him to retain his present appointment in Greenwich Hospital. Sir James Gordon has, however, received official notification from the Admiralty that, should health, or other circumstances, compel him to give up the lieutenant-governorship, he will be placed in his proper position as a vice-admiral.

THE Meander frigate, 40, commissioned by the Hon. Henry Keppel, left Sheerness on Wednesday week, for Portsmouth, where she will complete her equipment for sea, and proceed some time in the next month to convey Mr. Brooke to the new government of Labuan. The Meander will remain stationed in the Indian Archipelago.

Commander Hugh Goold having suffered too severely from a recent accident on board the Victory, whilst in the discharge of his duty, to admit of his return to his ship, he has under medical advice resigned the arduous post of Commander of the Ordinary at Portsmouth, and Commander Sidney Grenfell (1840), who was Lieutenant of the Cyclops steam-frigate at the attack upon Gebal and the storming of Sidon, has been appointed to succeed him.

The whole of the ships and vessels fitting out at Portsmouth have been obliged to have gangs of riggers from the rigging-house to assist in fitting them, in consequence of the very indifferent qualifications of the seamen who have as yet entered for them, and their paucity of numbers.

THE "TAY."—By the Montrose, we have some further intelligence respecting the Tay steamer, which left Southampton with the West India mail on the 2nd Dec., 1847. It appears she left Corunna on the 20th ult., and started from Madeira, in hopes of catching the Medway, which left Southampton on the 17th ult. Fortunately, she succeeded in meeting the Medway at Madeira, on the 26th ult. The Tay then transhipped a portion of the West India mail on board the Medway, which proceeded on to St. Thomas and Porto Rico with the mails, and proceeded to Bermuda, and from thence to the Gulf, with the Mexican mails. By this arrangement, the West Indian mails will be delivered about a fortnight earlier than would otherwise have been the case.

CUSTOM HOUSE APPOINTMENTS.—We understand that the arrangements of filling up the office of Inspector-General of the Warehousing Department of the Customs in London, vacant by the promotion of Mr. Howe to the rank of Surveyor-General, have now been completed; and Mr. R. Chapman, Landing Surveyor of the second class, has been selected to succeed Mr. Howe. An additional Inspector-General is also appointed at Liverpool, and Mr. St. John, one of the Landing Surveyors of the port of London, has been selected for that very responsible office.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

THE Central Station of the Electric Telegraph Company, at the end of Founders'-court, in Lothbury, is one of the best of the recent architectural adornments of the city of London. Its exterior, though necessarily limited in width, is very bold in character and picturesque in detail; whilst the interior is remarkably elegant in arrangement and profuse in ornament. Many of our readers are thoroughly conversant with the narrow passage called Founders'-court, in Lothbury, in the rear of the Bank of England; but to those who are not called by business or pleasure, or both, into that region of gold, the centre of commercial London, it is necessary to mention that Founders'-court is not above thirteen feet wide, and therefore the architectural enrichments of the front of the Central Telegraph Station are of very simple character. A boldly-designed doorway—the key-stone ornamented with a head, nicely sculptured—springing from rusticated work; above it a balcony, supported by trusses, having wreaths of flowers pendant from them; two enriched Ionic pilasters, supporting an entablature, simply ornamented, but in excellent style, and carrying an arched pediment—and, in the space between them, a clock, on a plinth, having sunken panels, and supported at the sides by inverted trusses,—are the leading points of the architectural arrangements, and produce a very satisfactory effect. Above the clock, and depending at its sides, are fruits and flowers, in high relief, exceedingly well done. In a panel, at the upper part of the building, are the words "Central Telegraph Station."

THE CENTRAL ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH STATION, LOTHBURY.

A flight of six steps leads to the interior of the edifice; and on entering the Hall the visitor is struck by its novel and beautiful effect. The space of ground occupied by the entire building (exclusive of subscribers' rooms) is about 70 feet by 38; and great praise is due to the architect for the skilful mode in which he has arranged his plans, so as to give a capacious Hall for the general business to be transacted in, and yet to allow of space for the utmost freedom of access to the different rooms in which the electric correspondence is carried on. The greatest length of the building is from east to west, the shortest from north to south; and in plan the Hall, which is in the centre of the building, is nearly a square, being about 42 feet from east to west, and in the other direction extending the whole depth of the building, within the walls—that is, 32 feet.

At the east and west ends a screen of two stories crosses the hall, in the manner shown in our Engraving, the first story being supported by columns of the Doric order, painted in imitation of porphyry, resting on plinths, in imitation gold veined marble, carrying their proper entablature and frieze; and the upper story by columns of the Corinthian order, the shafts painted in imitation of sienna marble, their capitals and bases of white. These stories form capacious galleries, having communication with the apartments in which are the Electric Telegraph Machines; and, to connect the two ends of the building, galleries, of nearly the width of the first intercolumniation from the wall, run along the northern and southern sides. These galleries are supported by trusses springing from the frieze in the respective stories. The trusses to the upper story are very highly enriched, and of beautiful design; those to the lower of plainer though elegant outline. The blank walls, running from east to west, have pilasters corresponding in order to the pillars of the screens and painted like them; and, in the intercolumniations, are arches springing from small pilasters attached to the larger ones. On the south side is the entrance from Lothbury, and the door projects somewhat into the Hall, to allow of a room for the porter; while the gallery before-mentioned follows the projection, as shown in our view. Immediately opposite the Lothbury entrance is a small doorway leading into the Subscribers' Rooms, and above this doorway is a dial clock. A continuous rail, of light and elegant design, runs along the lower galleries, and is also introduced in the spaces between the columns at either end, and from it spring branches for gas-lights. A railing of plain but close pattern also bounds the upper galleries.

THE HALL OF THE CENTRAL ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH STATION, LOTHBURY.

The glazed windows behind the counter separate an office, called the "translating office," from the body of the Hall. In this office all messages are transferred or translated into the abbreviated code arranged by the Company: but it is to be observed, that all such messages as descriptions of persons suspected of any dishonesty are not translated, but sent in full; only the lists of prices in corn, share, and other markets are so abbreviated.

These windows separate from the body of the Hall offices for clerks, in communication with those employed at the machines above; and who have to receive messages, through the sliding panes before noticed, and transmit them to their fellow clerks above stairs, by the aid of "lifts," or small trays working up and down, by means of cords, in square tubes. There is a "lift" and a bell in connexion with every desk. The motive power to these lifts is given by the clerk at the desk above, who, on his alarum being touched, turns a winch, and elevates the tray in an instant. As there are separate "lifts" to each desk, so, of course, there are separate tubes for each to work in. On the first story the apartments, in which are the machines, are not nearly so lofty as the Corinthian pilars would seem at first sight to indicate them to be; in fact, this story is divided into two, by a floor, which does not project so far forward as the series of archways, which both ornament the walls and allow of ingress to the machine-room; and therefore a plain railing is carried along to make all secure. In our View, this second flooring, and the hand-rail, is shown in the archways behind the Corinthian columns.

The roof of the Hall is very effective in its character, and as all the light the Hall receives is from this source, a large portion of it is glazed. In plan, the roof is crossed, transversely and longitudinally, by four large beams, so arranged as to leave a square space of about 27 feet wide in the centre, the other portions of the roof are ceiled with deeply moulded and ornamented panels, divided from each other by beams, having on their soffits enrichments of the Etruscan fret pattern. The square space before mentioned is not vacant, but is coved at the sides, and subdivided into twenty-five deeply sunken panels, (each glazed with rough plate glass,) by beams crossing each other. The under sides of the beams are very richly decorated with a double guilloche pattern running along them; and, at their intersections, are pendant ornaments. The sides of the panels are also embellished with minute ornament, and the whole of the details are beautifully worked out. The ceilings, to the lower galleries, have rich flowers in the centres of the panels.

In the machine galleries the wires are carried along the ceilings from the respective machines to the battery chambers and the test box; the battery wires running east and west, and the "house wires," to test box, north and south. The desks and machines, which are of Cooke and Wheatstone's Patent, are all of polished mahogany, and are very beautifully fitted up; and thereare eighteen desks, thus affording accommodation for thirty-six machines, in the six apartments devotedto them All the wires are numbered at the desks, to correspond from batteries to machines, and from machines to the test box, that the electric circuit may be complete

The west side of the building is devoted to the transaction of the business connected with the cities and towns on the North-Western lines, and also to the Great Western; whilst the eastern side is for the service of the Eastern, South-Eastern, and South-Western lines, and the Admiralty.

Supposing a message is required to be sent to Liverpool, the sender goes to the counter on the west side and hands the message, written out, to one of the clerks there, who takes the money, and gives a receipt for it. The written paper is then passed into the translating office, where it is duly transferred into the code arranged by the Company. This done, the clerk touches the alarum, and puts the message on the "lift" for Liverpool, which is immediately drawn up by the clerk at the machine, who instantly sets to work, and, in a few seconds, the message reaches its destination.

Having said thus much about the structure erected for the purposes of the Company, we will descend into the basement of the building, and describe the apparatus by which communication is carried on, and for which there are large vaults well lighted up with gas.

The wires from the several railway termini are brought through iron pipes, laid down under the pavement of the streets; and, meeting in Founders'-court, are brought through the south wall of the basement of the station in the manner indicated in our Diagram No. 1; and, descending into a long box, called the "test box," are fastened there to pegs fitted into the back of the box. At the bottom of the test box run a corresponding number of wires, called the "house wires," and these go to the machines in the galleries. Connection is maintained between the line and house wires by small wires running perpendicularly from one to the other. The "house" wires are numbered from 1 to 81 consecutively, and the others according to the respective stations whence they come. Thus, the North-Western Railway Station, in Euston-square, has twenty-seven wires in connection with it; the North-Eastern and Eastern Counties, nine; the South-Eastern, nine; the South-Western, nine, and there are nine in connection with the Admiralty; besides eighteen in spare tubes, for any future period. The Great Western has no separate communication with the Central Station, as the telegraph lines only go as far as Slough; therefore, all messages are sent viâ the North-Western Line as far as the Kensington branch railway, then along that to the Great Western to Paddington, whence they proceed to Slough. All communications with Bristol are sent to Birmingham, and thence by Birmingham and Bristol line of telegraph.

The reason so many wires are laid from the Central Station to the railway termini is lest any of the wires become defective, when the connexion can be carried on by other wires, as the expense of taking up the pavement would be enormous for so slight a cause. The test box is usually kept closed by shutters, and machines are kept handy to test any of the wires which may be signalled as weak.

In our Diagram No. 2 we give an elevation of one side of the Battery Chamber, which is for the service of the North-Western line. At A the wires from the several machines enter the room, and are carried to the respective batteries. Our view shows but one series of batteries on each shelf; but, in reality, they are arranged in pairs or nearly so; and some shelves contain five, others six and seven, batteries each. Should a battery become weakened by evaporation, the wires are instantly carried to other batteries. The batteries are the old-fashioned ones on Wollaston's principle, and contain 23 pairs of plates each, the intervening spaces being filled with sand, moistened with acid diluted with about 10 parts of water.

The Subscribers' Room is a very handsome apartment, having a roof of similar open character to that of the Hall, though not of such extent, and the glass filling the panels is engraved on a dull ground. The enrichments are of different designs, but very excellent style and execution. When complete, with its tables, chairs, and other furniture, this room will have an exceedingly piquant character.

There are offices for the Engineer and Superintendent in rooms above the machine-rooms, on a level with the roof.

The gas-lights are on Faraday's principle of ventilation.

The several clocks in the building are all Bain's patent electric clocks, as is the illuminated dial in the front of the building.

The building is thoroughly warmed by hot air, but the ventilation of it is by no means on a good system, as the machine-rooms and upper galleries are excessively hot and unpleasant.

The whole of the arrangements relating to the batteries, wires, and general working business of the Company are entrusted to Mr. N Holmes; and it needs but a brief glance at the completeness with which everything is ordered, and the perfect system which reigns through every part of the building, to know how successful his arrangements are, and how worthy the highest possible praise.

We must here observe, that this Station of the Company is not publicly opened yet, as the whole of the arrangements are not quite completed; and that, though messages are sent through it, they are merely done so for the accommodation of the public.

The building is from the designs of Mr. H. A. Hunt, of Parliament-street, and, as we have before said, does infinite credit to his taste and skill; and we need but mention the name of Mr. J. Thomas, of Lambeth, to whose care all the modelling and decorative embellishments are entrusted, and whose great facility of invention has been so conspicuously displayed in the New Palace at Westminster, to show that in detail the work is as felicitous as in general arrangement. The builders were Messrs. Piper.

COMME il est impossible de faire parvenir aux Souscripteurs une gravure d'une aussi grande étendue, sans en détruire en partie l'effet par des plis nécessairement nombreux, il s'est pensé, qu'en les divisant en trois parties, chacune d'un moyen très simple de rendre la feuille tout aussi plate que si elle n'avait jamais été pliée.

Il faudra sur une table ou surface très unie, assez d'un pour que la feuille en soit très bien étendue. Placer alors sur la table, la Gravure en dehors étendue et également, en tamponnant avec une éponge jusqu'à ce que tous les plis aient disparu entièrement. Laisser sécher. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1848.

ACCIDENTS on Railways are so regularly discussed when they happen, and forgotten when the shock is passed, as the tides rise and fall. In proportion to the loss of life and limb is the interest felt in a particular case; it would be very possible to construct an instrument that should accurately measure and graduate the amount of public indignation and fear on these occasions; the number of killed and wounded, and their rank in life—for that is a great element—being known, the degree of excitement all over the country can be calculated to a nicety. It might be called the "Railway Horror-Meter;" for upon it, the name would look as scientific as any of the thousand "meters" at present existing.

The regularity with which the public mind is excited on this subject, only to sink again into total apathy, is becoming perfectly ridiculous. The only rational effect of alarm, which is to enforce some practical precautions, is never or rarely ensured. If a calamity occurs by the drunkenness or stupidity of a railway servant, the chances are that the next accident will have somebody of the same class still more stupid or more drunk as the causer of it, plainly proving that the managers have done nothing to improve their staff in the interim. It is not long since one train was run into another by the blunder of the man stationed at the points: at Christmas an express train was seen darting down a line for some score of miles with the stoker and engineer both drunk and asleep! This time the delinquent is "not known at the points" saved the whole of the passengers from a dreadful fate—he let the train run along the main line instead of turning it off into the branch. This week death and wounds have been dealt about by a luggage train running at a high speed into a passenger train, stopped for a short time by an accidental derangement of some part of the machinery, though the signals were sent back, though it was a clear night, and objects could be distinguished at the distance of three miles. It is impossible not to suspect mismanagement or incapacity of the grossest kind. The approaching train was going at undue speed, with no look-out, and was only brought up by the crash. How is this frequent recurrence of stupidity or carelessness, where intelligence and vigilance are so much needed, to be accounted for? It will be observed, that in most of these cases it is not the machinery, the mechanical agency, that is in fault—that generally does its part well, and can be calculated on almost with certainty. It is the men working it who cause the catastrophes. This is so far a consolation, that it admits the remedy of displacing stupidity by ability, and heedless men by those who, like Cromwell's Ironsides, will "have some conscience in what they do." The only thing wanted in this case, as in most others, is to pay the price of the higher qualities. We firmly believe, if strictly inquired into, cheapness, economy, or "screwing" will be found at the bottom of most railway casualties. All the human virtues are not purchaseable for a few shillings a week; the advocate of "supply and demand" may say, plenty of men will do the work for that money—there is such a "competition!" Undoubtedly there is a keen, a fearful struggle for life; but what must, so impelled, will undertake to do, is no assurance that they can do it. There is the fallacy; the "cheap" worker for the reduced price promises to do the duty: under average circumstances, he goes through it; but infallibly comes the casualty that proves him unfit or unequal to the task. We are too much in the habit of expecting an impossible perfection of qualities from those whose reward is only equal to the most ordinary services; as a natural consequence, the higher qualities are professed only, they do not exist.

If railway companies will cut down their expenses that the half-yearly meeting may show a good dividend, and the discontented shareholder (who is always present) may be mollified, they must not expect anything more in their servants than pretence of fitness for their work. And on every occasion where a question for the public themselves, who are the shareholders; they travel, they run the risks, and they must decide between a slight additional profit, or a smaller dividend and the sense of security. The question would soon be settled if put thus:—Would you, as individual railway proprietors, prefer taking your chance in a "regular smash" on your own line, to expending on its better management the few shillings a year the screwing and cutting system puts into your pocket?

THE WEATHER.

THE sky during the past week has chiefly been clouded, but less so than it was during the previous week. There have been two or three fine days; the direction of the wind has been variable, and the temperature of the air has been exceedingly low, with frosts every night, and sharp ones on several nights. On Thursday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; a slight rain was falling at 1h. P.M., and continued during the remainder of the day; the direction of the wind was N.N.W., but light; and the average temperature of the air for the day was 42°. Friday, the sky was overcast all day; the air was misty, and at times a considerable fall of rain occurred; the wind was light and N.E. and generally; the air was calm; the average temperature of the air for the day was 40°. Saturday, the sky was cloudless after 10h. A.M.; the day was fine, with light airs from the N.E.; the average temperature of the air for the day was 39½. Sunday, the sky was principally cloudless; the air was misty and foggy till towards the evening; the night was fair and clear; at a quarter before 10h. P.M. several fine and extensive falls of snow occurred, and sharply driven forward on the wind, which was N.E. and light, but the snow disappeared within a quarter of an hour, and a cold rain appear during the night. The direction of the wind was N.; and the average temperature for the day was 29½°. Monday, the sky was cloudy all day, and rain was falling at different times after noon; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; and the average temperature for the day was 38½°. Tuesday, the sky was nearly clear from 11h. A.M. to 6h. P.M., and nearly cloudy at other times; the direction of the wind was E.; the day was fine, but cold; its average temperature was 33½°. Wednesday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; the directions of the wind were E. and N.E.; the average temperature for the day was 33½°, and that for the week ending this day was 35½°.

REWARDS FOR GOOD CONDUCT. The house of a family named Kenna, at Arncrony, Ripperary, having been attacked by an armed party, they beat them off, followed them, armed with spades, and handed them over to the police. The case attracted the attention of Sir William Fraser, of the Life Guards: he wrote upon the subject to the Catholic clergymen of the parish, and, having received his reply, sent the following communication:—"The Life Guards Barracks, London, Jan. 7.—Rev. Sir, Absence from London has prevented me from replying to your obliging note, which I received some time ago. I enclose a £5 Bank of England note, No. 62,387, which I request you will have the goodness to forward to Kenna. I regret that he has received no official reward for his resolute conduct. A few such acts would do more towards suppressing outrage than any increase in the police force. May I request you to acknowledge the receipt of this?—I have the honour to remain, faithfully yours, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS FRASER. Rev Michael Scanlan, P.P. ballyginbon, Nenagh

PROSPECTIVE RESULTS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.—There is no doubt the Administration (of the United States) are heartily sick of the war, and would gladly creep out of it if they could. The immense loss which the country has sustained in killed and wounded, with the additional consideration of its enormous and accumulating debt, is beginning to attract public attention. When General Jackson retired from public life, his pride and boast was, that, during his administration, the whole of the national debt was paid in two years had been paid off. Only a few years have passed away, and one of his successors (Mr Polk) has illegally and unconstitutionally commenced a war against Mexico, which, in eighteen months, has emptied an overflowing treasury, and created a national debt of nearly one hundred millions of dollars, with a certainty, if the war continues, as it doubtless will, of adding to it an incalculable amount. And all this distress and misery is brought upon the country without producing any effect upon the enemy, or the slightest prospect of conquering a peace. Such is the difference between the statesmen of 1847 and 1847. What will be the situation of the country ten years hence, no thinking man dares to inquire.—New York Correspondent of the Times.

THE Courrier de Constantinople gives the following horrible narrative:—"A short time ago a female Christian, but of what nation is not known, entered the house of an Armenian priest at Ada Bazar, and finding it impossible to commit the robbery he intended without being discovered by the inhabitants, determined to murder them all. He first went into the chamber in which the priest's youngest daughter slept, but only wounded her in the hand before she made her escape from him, and fled to her father for protection. The father armed himself with a hatchet, and met the robber, who had followed the child. A sanguinary conflict ensued, but terminated in the death of the priest; after which the assassin murdered his wife, his eldest daughter, and another female who lived with them as companion. The youngest girl again escaped, got out of the house, and gave the alarm, but before any assistance could be obtained the wretch was off with his booty, and has not since been heard of."

RESTITUTION OF TITHES TO THE CHURCH

A committee, consisting of Lord John Manners, Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., the Earls Ivon W. I. Gladstone, M.P., Sir Stephen Glynne, Bart., the Dean of Chichester, the Rev. R. Spencer, D.C.L., the Rev. [illegible] Chandos Pole, and other gentlemen and gentlemen's sons, is formed, for the purpose of restoring the tithes now held by lay impropriators to the exclusive use of the Church. A preliminary meeting was held in part of last week, for the purpose of associating together those who were favourable to the object; and, the requisite means for carrying out the operations having been attained, the committee alluded to has been formed, and has published an explanatory statement of its objects and principles. The announcement of this movement has attracted a favourable notice of many, and communications from owners of impropriate tithes have been received, showing a readiness on their part to meet the views of the committee; and, in some instances, expressing a willingness to make a considerable sacrifice in so doing. Encouraged by these facts, the committee recommend the following plan of operations for effecting the objects desired:

"1. That means should be presented to all desiring to assist in this work by the formation of a body to be denominated 'The Tithe Redemption Trust for the Church of England and Wales.'

"2. That the affairs of this body be conducted by a board, consisting of clergymen and laymen, and the Right Reverend the Bishops of the Church of England, and to all other Archbishops and Bishops of the Holy Catholic Church," and which, it says are in course of circulation

A memorial from the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Gloucester to the Bishop of the Diocese, in reference to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford, was published last week. The following is the Bishop of Gloucester's reply:—

"TO THE CLERGY OF THE ARCHDEACONRY OF GLOUCESTER

"Stapleton, Jan. 13

"My Rev. Brethren,—I beg you to accept my best acknowledgements for your consideration in regard to the late appointment of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford, which was voted by a large majority of a meeting of the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Gloucester, on the 11th ult. I assure you, sincere satisfaction that the measures I adopted, in conjunction with other Bishops, with the hope of obviating the discussions likely to be caused in the Church by the appointment, have appeared to the majority of the number of my clerical brethren; and I join with them in humble prayer to the Chief Shepherd, that the prudence of his Holy Spirit may be vouchsafed in every duty of trial to his faithful servants

"believe me to be, my Rev Brethren, your faithful friend yours,

"J. H. GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

"To the Rev. Canon Selwyn and the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Gloucester."

AN ENGLISH BISHOP IN CHINA. It is intended, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, to found a new Bishopric somewhere in the Chinese seas, probably at Victoria, Hong Kong. Towards the funds for this purpose there is at present upwards of £18,000 in hand (£5000 of which is for a college, granted in part by anonymous donors, and the remainder collected under a pastoral letter by the Bishop of London), but the remaining sum necessary is to be collected by voluntary subscriptions, about £30,000 being required before the consent of the Government for the foundation of a new See can be expected.

THE BISHOPRIC OF HEREFORD.

THE opposition raised against the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford has naturally directed the attention of the public towards that Diocese; and we think a brief sketch of its history will not be misplaced, if we give a short account of some of the incidents and personages connected with the Bishopric. Hereford is said to have been the residence of a Bishop as early as the year 544; but the names of bishops who appear to have filled the See (as did Cuthbert, who was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury in 741, by his injunctions the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed were read to the people in their native tongue. The life of a saint, written by those whose object it was to elevate his character to such a degree as to make his canonisation a duty, naturally contains so much of the strange and incredible, that there is considerable difficulty in sifting out sufficient truth to satisfy modern readers as to the real character of the individual. Shrewd and talented there is no doubt that he was skilled in polemics, and quick-sighted enough to take advantage of passing circumstances, and of turning them to his own benefit. He was High Chancellor of England under Hen y III., and was entrusted with a share of the government of the kingdom during the minority of that monarch. He contrived also, in those palmy days of pluralities, to secure to himself three Canonries and two Archdeaconries. At last, at the age of 56, on the 8th of October, 1234, "according to his monkish chronicler, "set up as a light in the candlestick of the See."

He presided over it only seven years, and those were not years of peace. He was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, and the Earl of Gloucester; and it was during a journey to Rome, to obtain the assistance of the Pope, that he died at Civita Vecchia, 27th August, 1242. It was customary at that time for the Bishops of Hereford to be buried in the different places which had their share in the advantages to be derived from such possessions. Part of the body of Thomas Cantilupe was deposited in a church near Florence; his heart was buried at Ashridge, in Buckinghamshire; while his bones were conveyed to Hereford Cathedral, where they were deposited in a tomb erected in the Lady Chapel.

The miracles performed over his remains were so great and so numerous, that the same man surpassed even the saint of Aquitaine himself "superstition," as old Fuller says. "He always found out the youngest saint." His remains were transferred to the north transept, where a splendid monument was raised over them in 1287.

To give all possible importance to the translation, Edward II. is said to have come over from Calais to be present at the ceremony. The miracles increased. Writers vary in the account of the number; some modestly mentioning 103, while others say that 425 were wrought at his tomb. Twenty five years after his death, a commission was appointed by the Church of Rome to inquire into his life and character and the nature of the miracles performed. These pieces were all satisfactorily settled, and Thomas Cantilupe, Bishop of Hereford, was added to the list of canonised saints. The arms of Aquitaine were removed from the Cathedral and the Bishop of Lincoln's arms were inserted in their stead. Miles three leopards' heads jessant, with a fleur de lis issuing from the mouth.

Some years after, the see was occupied by Joan Trelick, who made a powerful effort to get the Bishop of Salisbury's days and festivals usually performed in churches; all persons taking part therein were denounced under the pain of cursing and excommunication. His tomb was opened in 1813, when part of his skeleton and the skull of a mouse's nest, which are now preserved in the Cathedral.

Thomas Spofford, who was promoted to the Bishopric in 1421, is a memorable instance of a Bishop retiring from his dignity. The Pope, by a bull, allowed him to withdraw from his high office, and retire to the abbacy of St. Mary, at York. Its successor allowed him £100 a year from the revenue.

Nothing is recorded of St. Mary's exact, was Bishop of Hereford for seven months only, when he was translated to London, where he died, leaving behind him a memory loaded with the charge of the grossest covetousness. John Harley, who succeeded him, was a man of learning and piety, and peace was restored. This Prelate, perhaps, carried on with him as years advanced, somewhat of the disputing spirit which he possessed at college, where Sir John Harrington describes him as being "an active man, who played with learning, and could toss an argument in the schools even better than a ball in the Tennis Court." Francis Godwin, his successor, is best remembered by his "Catalogue of the Bishops of England." Nothing has been given to posterity on behalf of the history and keys of the Bishop's gates, by putting a watch to oppose his watch, by forbidding the bells to be rung as had been customary, and by forcing every poor man to become a sworded man." Mutual concessions were after a time made

According to the latest advices, the Russian Ambassador at Rome has at length [illegible] arrangement of the religious differences between his Holiness and the Emperor of Russia, with an apology for the delay which prevented the Pope from announcing the fact in his last allocution. It appears that, according to this treaty, there are to be seven Catholic dioceses in Russia and Poland, and that the Bishops are not to be appointed without the consent of the Russian Government. The Catholics in Russia and Poland are to be treated with respect, and there is to be no obstacle thrown in the way of religious worship according to the creed of the Roman Church.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Monday, a public meeting of the members and friends of this institution was held at the London Coffee-house, the Rev. John Harding, M.A., rector of St Anne's, Blackfriars, presiding. Several speakers referred, in terms of eulogy, to the Society operations in India (where the most extraordinary conversions had taken place through the instrumentality of the Missionaries), and various districts whilh the Society had taken under its care. In China, the Rev. George Smith, of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, had made an exploratory visit, in conjunction with another clergyman, and the reports which had been made by those gentlemen induced the belief, that, if proper exertions were made, Christianity might be extensively diffused, at no distant day, throughout that extensive and populous country. Resolutions, affirming the [illegible] and pledging the meeting to the [illegible] was passed to the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

SANATORY REFORM.—On Wednesday night a public meeting on this subject, called by the National Philanthropic Association, was held in the Hanover-square rooms. Mr. Wakley, M.P., in the chair. Mr. C. Cochrane moved the first resolution, viz.—"That it has for a series of years been clearly demonstrated by commissions connected with the legislative and Government departments, and powerfully enforced by practical evidence from the National Philanthropic Association and other benevolent societies, instituted for the purpose of promoting sanatory reform, that the nation suffers to an alarming extent, in a moral, physical, and pecuniary point of view, from the absence of an effective law for the protection of public health; and these evils are peculiarly to be traced to deficient sewage and house drainage, scanty and dear water supply, imperfect street-cleansing, and a wretched construction and ventilation of the dwellings of the poorer classes, and the imposition of a tax on windows." Sir C. Aldis briefly supported the resolution, which was put and carried unanimously. Mr. C. A. Walker proposed the second resolution, which was seconded by Mr. George, viz.—"That the practice of burying the dead in places surrounded by the abodes of the living has been attended by a disregard of Christian decency, and a violation of the sanctity of the grave. That the frequent exhumation of human remains has engendered a feeling of disrespect for the dead, whilst the constant disturbance of earth saturated with the decomposing gases emanating from the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

ENTHRONISATION OF THE NEW ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

The enthronisation of the Right Rev. Dr. Musgrave, Lord Archbishop of York, took place in York Minster, on Thursday, the 13th instant, as described in our late edition of last week. Many thousand spectators witnessed the ceremony, which was very impressive.

Our Artist has illustrated that stage of the proceedings at which the Chapter, clergy, &c., having proceeded to the great western door of the Cathedral, and there met the Archbishop, accompanied by one o his chaplains, and his Grace, attired in his full sacerdotal robes, and followed by his train-bearer, entered the Cathedral, and was there received by the President, when the enthronisation proceeded as we have already detailed.

Roman Catholic Chapel in Bute.—James Hamilton, Esq., has given a site on his estate of Kames for a Roman Catholic church. The building will be immediately commenced. The spot fixed on is near the Point House, on the road leading from Rothesay to Port Bannatyne. There has hitherto been no stated place of worship in Bute in connexion with the Roman Catholic church.

SUPERB STATE CARRIAGE.

We present our readers with an Engraving of the State Carriage which has just been designed and built or the Peruvian Republic, by Messrs. Wyburn and Waller of Long Acre, London, coach-builders to her Majesty.

Our Illustration will convey an accurate idea of the symmetrical beauty of the Carriage: of the selection and adaptation of its colours we subjoin a brief account. The lower panels are painted rich ultramarine, and emblazoned with the arms of the Republic; the bright colouring of the numerous flags, banners, and gold ornaments, contrasting with the blue in the background, produce a most pleasing effect.

The usual heavy appearance of the upper panels is relieved by three windows in each side, and also by large windows extending the whole width of the back front. The intermediate compartments are decorated with festoons of flowers, selected from the English Flora, as being most acceptable to the Peruvian taste. These are not only painted in the most brilliant colours, but in the reality of nature. We understand this is the first attempt at introducing this style of painting for carriages.

The under-carriage, or, as our French neighbours call it, le train, is vermillion. The springs, axletrees, and the carving, which is very profuse, is in gold. Around the roof is a very chaste foliaged fret-work also gilded.

The inside is lined with white and scarlet-striped satin, and lacings to correspond; the roof is in the form of a star, in white satin, with a gold centre.

The body is supported at each corner by gold snakes, and the upper part of the springs is similarly attached.

The hammercloth is white cloth, fringed with scarlet and gold; and the centre is of rich blue Genoa velvet, fluted; and on it are placed the arms, richly chased and embossed.

The Harness, for four horses, is very magnificent, and is also made by Messrs. Wyburn and Waller.

A chasseur, with his plumed cap and couteau de chasse, accompanied by a native Peruvian, in his broad hat and graceful poncho (or horseman's cloak), will occupy the place of our footman.

This State Carriage is a fine specimen of British skill in coach-building, artistic embellishment, and decoration. Accompanying it is a private carriage for the President of Peru which is also in excellent taste.

SUPERB STATE CARRIAGE FOR THE PERUVIAN REPUBLIC.

EDWIN CHADWICK, ESQ.

EVERY one must be conversant with the name of this distinguished economist. His labours for the public weal have been as varied as they have been useful; and the "Blue Books," in which some of these labours are conveyed to the world, are amongst the most valuable and interesting papers published by Parliament. Mr. Chadwick was called to the bar on the 26th November, 1830, by the Society of the Inner Temple, when he was about twenty-eight years of age. Whilst engaged in the study of the law, he associated almost as much with medical as with law students, and he took an active interest in medical controversies. His first public writing with which we are acquainted was an article in the Westminster Review, in 1828, on Life Assurances, controverting the doctrines of several eminent actuaries as to certain assumed laws on which tables, more advantageous to their companies than to the public, were founded, and contending that better data, having reference to the varying circumstances under which the population was placed, were required, especially for the safety of the funds of the labouring classes invested in their benefit societies. This article was reprinted, and published separately. In 1829 he was engaged as a contributor to the London Review, which was brought out by Mr Senior and by Dr. Whately, the present Archbishop of Dublin, and edited by the late Mr. Blanco White. Mr. Chadwick wrote two articles on public administrative subjects: one, on a Preventive Police, in which he opened the important subject of the practical means for preventing crime, which he has been understood to have studied, and to have been desirous of developing more fully. The other article was on the Administration of Medical Charities in France, in which principles for the general administration of public charities were put forth. This article was also reprinted, and has been frequently quoted.

These writings on administrative subjects attracted the notice of Mr. Jeremy Bentham, and led to a strong friendship between Mr. Bentham and Mr. Chadwick. At that time Mr Bentham was preparing a draft of an administrative code, in which he desired Mr. Chadwick to set forth the functions of a Minister of the Public Health and a Minister of Police. Other occupations, at the time, prevented Mr. Chadwick from performing the task assigned to him by the great jurist, who afterwards offered to place Mr. Chadwick in independent circumstances, if he would engage to devote himself exclusively to the advancement of his works. This offer was, however, declined; but Mr. Bentham, in his will, mentioned him in terms of affection, and bequeathed to him a part of his library and a small legacy. When Mr. Chadwick has entered into any subject he has professed to have investigated the facts de novo to the extent of his means and to have based his conclusions upon them, and not upon any preconceived opinions of any school. He was about to offer himself for practice at the common law bar, and was, at the same time, under an engagement to the late Mr. Sutton Sharpe of the Chancery bar, and several eminent living law reformers, to take upon himself the editorship of the Jurist, which was established by them to promote the advancement of law as a science, when Lord Grey's Government issued the Commission of Inquiry into the Administration of the Poor Law, and Mr. Chadwick was applied to and engaged to assist it as an Assistant Commissioner. The results of his investigations in the rural districts very early attracted the most prominent attention. He was, for a time, taken away from this Commission, and pressed into the service of another—the Commission of Inquiry into the Labour of Young Persons in Factories—of which Mr. Tooke, the author of "High and Low Prices," Mr. Chadwick, and Dr. Southwood Smith, were the Central Board.

The previous agitation, it may be remembered, was simply and solely for a reduction of the working hours to ten. The conclusion of the Report was that the working hours of the adults were in course of reduction, and that on their behalf no case had been made out; but that for the younger children ten hours were too much, and precluded the manufacturing population from the means of education. In respect to the children, the Commissioners reported that interference was required; and they recommended a provision of special schools for that class of children, and also a protective inspection, to ensure that the provisions were fully carried out. The measure was carried through the House of Commons; but the provisions for special schools was thrown out in the House of Lords by an opposition headed by the Marquis of Salisbury. On the occasions of extensive riots in the manufacturing districts, it has been pointed out that the most dangerous mobs have been composed chiefly of young persons of an age to have gone through the specialised education intended to have been provided, and which would in all probability have prevented the outrages, had the measures proposed in 1832 been carried out in their integrity. The foundation was then laid for the system of local inspection which has since been extended to the labour in mines and other branches of industry; and it has been the subject of continued representation to provide measures for education.

With regard to the amendment of the administration of the Poor Law, various measures were proposed, all of them dealing with the administration parochially, except the set of measures proposed by Mr. Chadwick, which were supported by a large mass of evidence, and adopted by the Commissioners. He was appointed one of the Chief Commissioners, that he might prepare the Report. This had been delayed by his labours on the Factory Commission, and he was largely assisted in its preparation by Mr. Senior. These measures might be, in themselves, the subject of a history. Of the set of measures proposed, those which were adopted were chiefly for the direct repression of abuses, and part of the remedial measures; but, as Mr. Chadwick proposed them, they were accompanied by large measures of prevention. As respects the young, he enforced the necessity of industrial training, and indicated the establishment of district schools; and as to the adults, the entire abolition of the Law of Settlement. During the last Session, he took occasion to vindicate his original propositions on this topic, in several days' examination before a Committee of the House of Commons, when he developed the servile condition of the agricultural labourer, and the moral and social, as well as the economical, importance of setting free the agricultural labour market. In a speech before the tenant farmers, he expounded his views on this subject, which have been extensively adopted by leading agriculturists. Amongst the extracts from the evidence which he had collected, and which was published in 1832, portions of evidence are given to establish the conclusion of the economy of using the known means of preventing disease, as one means of preventing pauperism, and reducing the charges on the Poor's Rates. In 1838, when typhus was rife in the metropolis, he took occasion to re-urge the subject upon attention. He obtained the consent of the Poor Law Commissioners to a special inquiry, on instructions as to the prevalence of certain physical causes of fever in the metropolis, which might be removed by proper sanatory measures. The special inquiry was made by Dr Arnott, Dr Kay, and Dr. Southwood Smith. The evidence then elicited awakened attention to the subject. Whatsoever labours Mr. Chadwick might have given to it were interrupted by his duties, under a previous appointment as a Commissioner for Inquiring into the Constitution and Means of Improving the Constabulary Force for England and Wales. His colleagues were the present Speaker of the House of Commons and Colonel Rowan, one of the Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police Force. They have made their first Report in 1839 on the Constitution of a Constabulary Force. It is understood that a part only of the evidence collected was presented, and that another Report on the Measures Preventive of Crime was in preparation; but Mr Charles Shaw Lefevre was taken away by his appointment as Speaker; and the sanatory inquiry having been extended from the metropolis to the whole of England and Wales, Mr. Chadwick took charge of it, and, over and above the daily and laborious duties of his office as Secretary to the Poor Law Commission (to which he had been appointed in 1834), prosecuted it unremittingly until he had completed the Sanatory Report. Medical men now practising in Manchester, Liverpool, and other towns, have avowed that it displayed to them conditions of the population, and the extent of the operation of noxious influences, of which they, though living amidst them, had not previously been aware. The remedies were systematically developed, and extended views taken of the relation of the town and rural districts, which are fully detailed in the Sanatory Report.

Mr. Chadwick proposes what may be called a venous and arterial system, for the improvement of towns. He has entered so closely into the mechanical details connected with it as to be consulted as an authority by engineers, professional persons, abroad as well as at home, and by agriculturists. He sets up no claim to intuition, or to other qualities than individual attention and unremitting labour in the prosecution of whatever he undertakes: he asks no confidence in his opinions, but an examination of the facts which he fully displays. From such care it has resulted that the measures he has proposed have invariably succeeded, to the extent to which they have been executed; and further experience has shown, in every instance, that what has been omitted will, sooner or later, require to be replaced.

EDWIN CHADWICK, ESQ., ONE OF THE METROPOLITAN SANATORY COMMISSIONERS.

UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION. A valuable donation of pictures and models has been made to this national institution by Mrs. Arabella Watson, widow of Mr. T. Watson, who for many years held a responsible situation in the Custom-house and who devoted all his leisure time to literature and the fine arts. The paintings, thirty-two in number, are of various sizes, and all represent naval subjects, including views of the battle of Trafalgar the storming of Algiers, and other naval victories. They are the production of the late Mr. Butterworth, who himself served in most of the engagements delineated. Mrs. Watson has also presented a bust of her lamented husband, executed in white marble, by Mr. Towne. This valuable addition has enabled the committee to form a new department, which was thrown open to subscribers and their friends, for the first time, on Monday.

EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

H.M.S. "PLOVER."

THIS vessel, of which we give an Engraving, has been lately fitted out at Sheerness, under the superintendence of Captain Thomas Moore, and is about to proceed in search of Captains Franklin and Crozier, now supposed to be in the Arctic Ocean. She is to go round Cape Horn to Lima, where she will victual; from thence through Behring's Straits into the Arctic Ocean, where the object and labours of her voyage commence. The command of this expedition has been very judiciously confided to this gallant and praiseworthy young officer, in consequence of his practical and theoretical science, and also from his already having made five Polar voyages, four in the Terror, and one under his own command. He is the only person who has traversed the earth at 76° 30′ south latitude, having been three parts of the way round with Captain Crozier in the Terror; and the rest he completed in a vessel in which he was sent by the Astronomical Society three years since. Every arrangement conducive to the comfort of the crew has been made, nor has a most extensive and well-selected library been forgotten. Our readers can easily imagine how every sort of amusement must be resorted to to relieve the ennui attendant on being three or four months at a stretch frozen in, with nothing but fields and mountains of ice on every side.

Theatrical entertainments, masquerades, &c., are also a great resource to while away the weary hours. The Plover was originally a Bombay pilot brig, about 220 tons, built of teak; she has since been doubled at the bows and sides (as will be seen in the Engraving), and strengthened in every way to withstand the enormous pressure consequent on being "iced up." She carries out a very large supply of nautical instruments, some of them the invention of her commander, which have elicited the encomiums of the Admiralty and Astronomical Society. She has also been fitted with compasses invented by that very scientific and deserving officer, Mr. Walker, R.N., her Majesty's Harbour Master at Plymouth. These compasses have so far got rid of "local attraction," that they were the only ones that could at all be depended upon in the iron brig Recruit; they have been highly spoken of by every person who has used them. Another expedition, under the command of Captain Bird, will proceed, about the fall of the year, through Davis's Straits, also in quest of Captains Franklin and Crozier.

We cannot conclude this brief account, without wishing every success to the undertaking of this gallant little band, who have so nobly devoted themselves to the laudable and arduous task of rescuing their fellow-countrymen; and, doubtless, the Government will not be tardy in rewarding every one engaged in this perilous expedition.

THE MATCH BY CORRESPONDENCE WITH AMSTERDAM.

The amateurs of Chess will be gratified to learn that the bold defiance which we last week published from the Chess Club of Amsterdam has been accepted by the London Chess Club, and hostilities may be expected to commence forthwith. The terms proposed by the latter are, that one game only shall be played, and that for a stake of one hundred guineas a side. The conduct of the match on the London side will be entrusted mainly to Mr Horwitz, assisted by two able coadjutors, Messrs. Shons and Perigal or Walker and Perigal, and it is calculated that a move on each side will be made every week. Some expressions of regret have reached us that the chief English players, Messrs. Staunton and Buckle, or Lewis and Frere, have not undertaken the contest. The cause is simply that the two former have not sufficient leisure to devote to it, and the latter have long given up the practice of the game The match, however, is in very good hands, and, with proper care and industry on the part of those engaged, we have not much apprehension of the result.

And White mated in two more moves.

(a) With the chess-board before him, Mr. Harrwitz would here have played R to K sq

(b) When one takes into account the difficulty of foreign combinations, where a player has no chess-board to assist him, many parts of this game will be admitted to be remarkably well played by White.

(c) R to K 8th (ch), followed by Q to K R 2nd, would have given Mr Clarke a good deal of trouble

(d) This appears to be suicidal; but, in truth, Black had no resource. If he played the Kt away again to K or Kt 5th, mate must have been inevitable in three more moves.

MODEL OF THE TABERNACLE OF ISRAEL.—An exhibition of singular interest has been opened at the New Society of Painters in Water-colours, which will afford considerable interest, both to the Biblical student and to the public in general. It is a model of the Tabernacle, as described in the book of Exodus, constructed, after a period of great literary research, by the Rev. R. W Harlthorn. There are few readers, we imagine, whose attention has not been arrested by the gorgeous description of this sacred building, and by the splendour of the offerings made, in obedience to the divine command, to the honour, the glory, and the eternal majesty of God. "And this is the offering ye shall take of them; gold, silver, brass, blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen, goats' hair, rams' skins dyed red, badgers' skins, shittim wood, oil for light, spices for anointing oil and for sweet incense, onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod and in the breast-plate And let them make a sanctuary that may dwell among them According to all that I shew thee after the pattern of the Tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall we make it." In its proportions, in its material, and decorations, the Reverend author has followed, with what accuracy we possible, the historical account; whenever the detail that has been found to fail, other authorities, which have on investigation been considered the most trustworthy, supply such assistance as was required. We are thus in possession of an embodied idea of a structure which, as being the first devoted to the worship of the true God, must live in the reverential memory of man for all time. As regards the Church of Christ, the Tabernacle of Testimony possesses to every Christian a peculiar interest, and it cannot be doubted but that this exceedingly clever work of learning and art will abundantly gratify all who shall pay it a visit. Another model is exhibited in the same room, which represents the general arrangement of the encampment of the Pilgrim Tribes of Israel, as well as the position occupied by the Sanctuary in the centre of that mighty host. The details are accordingly well worked out and the picturesque is managed with considerable skill

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, WESTMINSTER, JAN. 17.

IN RE [illegible]

[illegible] might be declared to the Fellowship on the foundation of [illegible] that the person holding it should be in Priest's orders at the time of the election, or within twelve months of publication of the statutes of 1840, by Bright disqualified, as at that time he would not be of the required age for Priest's orders? The main point here raised was the meaning of the word "sacerdos," in the statutes of the College framed in the reign of George II., whether it meant simply Priest, or was a generic term, and included Deacon? The question under the foundation of William of Durham was, whether a general preference was to be given to natives of the dioceses of York and Durham when qualified, or only where candidates should happen to be cæteris paribus. Mr. Covington was a native of the province of Canterbury.—The arguments of counsel occupied the whole day, and, at their conclusion on Wednesday, the Lord Chancellor asked for the affidavits and a copy of the statutes, and reserved his judgment.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY

IN THE BANKRUPTCY OF THOMAS JOHNSON, FORMERLY LORD MAYOR OF LONDON, AND BANKER AT ROMFORD.—In this matter an application was made by his Honour about three weeks ago, founded upon a memorial and certain affidavits produced by Mr. Lawrance on behalf of the bankrupt. At the sitting of the Court on Wednesday morning, Mr. Commissioner Goulburn said Mr. Lawrance at some length on the questions, whether the Court had the power, under the existing law, to reheat the question of granting a bankrupt his certificate after an absolute refusal so to do, especially after so long an interval of time had elapsed, and secondly, if such a discretionary power existed, whether this was a fit case to call for its exercise: and at the conclusion of the learned gentleman's argument, his Honour said, that if he were of opinion that he had the power mentioned in the petition, he would not feel that he was justified in accede to Mr. Lawrance's application; but he would not forget that he sat there judicially to give his opinion upon a question plainly put before him by the statute, and not after what he had been told he must have known that the moment the bankers in London held their hand the shutters of his bank would close, and the depositors could only hope for 5s. 6d. for every 20s. which they had entrusted to their care. The Commissioner further adverted to different figures and amounts of the receipts by the bankrupt from the bank, as collected from the proceedings; and concluded by saying, that, after the most anxious review of the whole case, he could not bring his mind to any other conclusion, but that the judgment he had pronounced upon it was the correct one, and that he ought not to rehear the case for the purpose of reversing or varying it.

IN THE BANKRUPTCY OF THOMAS WOOD. This case was heard on Thursday. The bankrupt, who held a high civic post in the City, was described in 1844 as No 2, Corbet-court, Gracechurch-street, attorney-at-law, dealer, and chapman. The balance-sheet, which commences on the 31st December, 1845, and ends on the 30th December, 1847, has the following items:—Cash in the following good debts: £715; doubtful debts, £740; bad ditto, £31; good debts of the late firm of Wood and Wickham, £3637; doubtful ditto, £619; bad ditto, £407; property, £136; property and other securities in the hands of creditors, £3019; assets, £1201; amount paid my late partner, H. Wickham, £240; business expenses £1782; household and personal expenses, £1384; deficiency on Dec. 31, 1845, the cause of which was explained, £1065; by payment made in settlement of the outstanding liabilities of the Tabarer Coal Company, £496. From an appendix to the balance-sheet, the following explanations appear in reference to the connection of the bankrupt with the Tabarer Coal Company:—Debts and liabilities bonâ fide paid by Alderman T. Wood, from the commencement of his connexion with the Tabarer Coal Company up to his bankruptcy, £4629; claims arising there-from, and greater part unliquidated, £597. Alderman Wood's professional bill against the company was £1198, less the sum of £200 received for stamping the deed of settlement, which was the only money that ever came into his hands from the company in any other capacity than as solicitor. The above balance sheet was prepared by Messrs. Banks, accountants. This was the meeting for the last examination of the bankrupt. There being no opposition, he passed his last examination.

POLICE.

WESTMINSTER

DARING ROBBERY.—John Wood, alias John White, a man having the appearance of an omnibus conductor, was finally examined before Mr. Broderip on Monday, charged with entering the dwelling-house of Mrs. Emily Lewis, 32, Grosvenor-place, and stealing to the amount of £5 worth of gold coins, the property of Williams, other valuable articles of jewellery and a number of coins. From the depositions of the witnesses it appeared that on the evening of Sunday week Mrs. Lewis went to a party in the neighbourhood, leaving her house in charge of Jackson, a footman, her servant. Subsequently, a man came to the house, and, after ringing the bell violently, told the servant that her mistress had been suddenly taken ill at her friend's house, and that she (the servant) was to go and to her immediately. As the man mentioned the number of the house where Mrs. Lewis was visiting, the servant had no doubt of the truth of his statement, and, at his suggestion, went to the house, and left him put on her bonnet and shawl. While she was so occupied, she thought she heard footsteps in the passage, and, on her return up-stairs, was about to enter the drawing-room, to see that all was right, when the man called out to her that, if she did not make haste, he must go without her. She accordingly hurried to the hall-door, where the man was standing stamping his feet, as if to warm them, and she left the house with him, closing the door securely after her. The fellow, after leading her up one street and down another, suddenly desired her to stop, while he ran over the way. He crossed the road, and, turning a corner, stopped down, in order to escape her observation. She then, for the first time, suspected that something was wrong, and followed him, but she soon lost sight of him, near St. George's-place, Knightsbridge. Jackson, who mentioned the matter to a constable of the B division, named Carmody, whom she accompanied to her mistress' house, in front of which they found several persons assembled. During her absence in search of the prisoner, Carmody, a friend of Mrs. Lewis's, who had been staying in London a few days, and had some valuable property deposited in her house, had endeavoured to enter with the latch-key, but, finding the door fastened, and getting no reply, and hearing suddenly the door opened, and on rushed the prisoner, knocking the gentleman down. Mr. Cavalliero, on calling the fellow, saw him drop two of his own valuable shirt-pins, a number of papers, a pocket-book containing six notes and other valuables. The prisoner struggled violently to escape, but the opportune arrival of the policemen Carmody and the servant prevented the possibility of his doing so. A valuable bracelet, which had been on Mrs. Lewis's toilet-table, was found on his person. A dove composed of brilliants, a £5 note, some sovereigns, [illegible] Mr. Cavalliero's traveling-bag and [illegible] belonging to [illegible]. The most extraordinary feature of the case is, how the robbers not only became acquainted with the circumstance of Mrs. Lewis being from home, but the actual address of the friend to whom she was upon a visit. The prisoner was ordered to be again brought before the magistrate that day fortnight.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET

WANTON CRUELTY TO A HORSE.—On Wednesday, Edward Nunn, Esq., of Leaming on, was summoned before Mr Hardwick, for having, on the 10th inst., wantonly and cruelly ill-treated and beaten a horse, in the parish of St. George Hanover-square, of which ill-usage the animal afterwards died. Mr Thomas, secretary to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, said Mr Nunn had admitted that he had ridden the mare from Leamington to London for a wager—ten to one, we were the odds. Witness had evidence to prove the great cruelty that had been exercised, and also that the mare had soon afterwards died. Mr. Nunn visited to compromise the matter, but the Society declined. Mr. Nunn's wish was to have the case investigated, and they had determined to listen to no representations of the sort. Mr. Nunn pleaded guilty to the charge.

Evidence was given that, on Sunday night, the 9th inst., Mr. Nunn was seen riding in Bruton-street, from the direction of Bruton street The horse on which he rode had a man on each side; one with a stick was beating it; Mr. Nunn was spurring it, and he continued to whip and spur the animal until he arrived at Lang's Hotel, Bond-street. The sides and other parts of the poor beast were bleeding profusely. Mr. Nunn got off and led the way to some stables in Bruton-street, one of the men carried rather a large stick, and he used it on the animal. The horse was carried rather a large stick, and he used it on the animal. The horse was carried further by the others, and presenting a pitiable sight. D. Watson, constable to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, said he went to the stables and found the mare was dead. Mr. Nunn pleaded guilty to the charge.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR YOUNG LADIES.

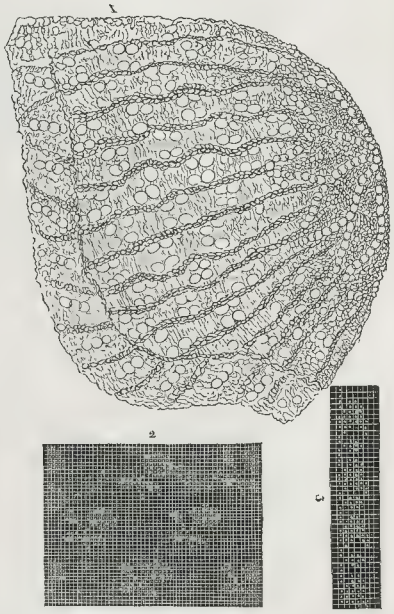
PARIS FASHIONS FOR YOUNG LADIES.



Our Fashions' review of this day is entirely devoted to our young lady friends, in advising them on their toilet. Nothing, perhaps, is more worth their attention than the good taste and chaste simplicity that should always preside in the management of their dress. In France, we reckon that the figure of a young lady never tells so highly in her favour as when the colours of her choice are quiet, and her elegance without dazzling effects. Mothers will undoubtedly feel equally interested in the fashions of those little dears who make the joy and the ornament of their homes; and our Paris Correspondent gives us details on these youthful fashions, which we feel a duty to submit to our female subscribers

The above Engraving gives an exact sketch of Evening Dresses for a juvenile party. The white crep gowns, or the organdine, are the most elegant for girls of fifteen, the bodies are made à la vierge, with short plain sleeves: long ones are adapted to them with buttons, according to the circumstances. A rose is fixed in the middle of the bosom, and a similar flower is placed on the right side of the ringlets, very low on the ear. These roses must be adorned with leaves, and one bud. Gold bracelets encircle the wrists. The material called barege is more generally used in summer, and makes very smart dresses for the summer evening soirées. Rose glaces, in very light shades, are very much worn for concerts by young ladies of eighteen. The skirts are very full; the bodies, forming a point, are opened, and plaits are regularly gathered from the bosom up to the shoulders. A white rose is placed in the middle of the bosom, and the sleeves are trimmed with a broad lace, a la Sevigne, falling and covering the elbow. Some gathered lace of the same pattern, mixed with white flowers, is fixed quite behind the head, covering the hair, and falling on the ringlets, or bandeaux.

Little girls, attired in short velvet gowns, are very pleasing. The skirts must be very full, the body square, and an embroidered chemisette. A coloured satin ribbon, passed through the gathering, and fixed by a bow in the middle of the bosom. Sleeves quite plain, very short, and gathered à la vestle to the elbow; and bows of ribbon fixed on them (see the Engraving); hair dressed à la Sevigne, with two roses or bows of ribbon fixed at each ear.

For young mothers, the Dresses for Evening Parties up to this day, for concerts, routs, &c., are composed, principally of satin, moire antique, reps brocha, velours épingle, trimmed with dentelles, tulle de soie, and ribbons

For Balls, the dresses are of lace, over satin petticoats. All the gowns of lace have, without exception, two or three skirts trimmed with roulenaux de satin, petits velours, bouillonnés, or blondes de couleur. The bodies have draperies to ornament them; they are more fashionable this year than the berthes, although the berthes are still worn.

The plain velvet robes are no longer considered as a full dress toilet; they are more adapted this winter for half-dress, and are worn with long sleeves

The Head Dresses for evening parties are splendid, in elegance and good taste: little toques of coloured velvet embroidered with gold, with a bunch of feathers on the side, have the most seducting effect. Petit bords in green velvet, embroidered on the edge with large white pearls, ornamented with a feather twisting under the front. Little caps of blonde and flowers are always very coquettish. Little puffs in lace and ribbons are not more stylish than caps, and are a greater novelty.

EXPLANATION OF CROCHET WORK.

The pattern we give, No. 2, is a plain crochet work, with steel or gold beads. The effect of it is most charming, when worked with green silk and steel beads, or blue silk with gold ones. Crochet work is assuredly the most pleasant for a young lady: every kind of ornament can be worked in that manner; mittes, purses, cuffs, collars, little mats, slippers, cabas, cigar cases, caps, head dresses, circassiennes, kamchatka, &c. &c.

LITTLE CHILD'S KNITTED CAP, WITH THE CROWN IN EIGHT DIVISIONS

Continue thus the pattern till you have knitted 46 rows from the crown, then pick up on a needle or a piece of thread the fifth part of the stitches, and continue to knit the two sides. After knitting like that 46 rows, diminish the sides at the end, repeat this six times, which will make 12 rows, which, with the preceding 46, make 58. Then make the little border for the front of the Cap, then pick up the stitches as in the heel of a stocking, and recommence to knit the stitches which were before left alone

Towards the ears knit six times together, 1 made and 1 plain, but, in the following row, these made stitches must be knitted by turning the stitch, that it may not be too open

FRENCH LIBEL LAW —M. Nogent Saint Laurens, the advocate of M Alexandre Dumas, on Friday week, pleaded in his behalf before the Civic Tribunal, in opposition to the demand made by the Marquis d'Espinay Saint-Luc, to the effect that certain passages in the romance entitled the "Dame de Montsoreau," in which his ancestor, the celebrated Espinay de Saint-Luc, is represented in an odious light as the mignon of Henry III., should be suppressed. The learned counsel, after some preliminary observations, in the course of which he thought it necessary to assure the Court that M. Alexandre Dumas is "de bonne race, et de bonne maison," and the son of an eminent general, went on to insinuate that the present Marquis d'Espinay Saint-Luc is not a lineal descendant of the celebrated Saint-Luc, the two branches of his house having (he said) long been extinct. He then entered into an elaborate argument, which he supported by quotations from contemporary writers, to prove that Saint-Luc was undoubtedly a mignon of Henry III. He did not, he said, deny that he subsequently became a distinguished soldier; but, in his romance, M. Alexandre Dumas had only dealt with him in his youth, and could not, therefore, represent him as other than he was, one of the King's mignons. The learned gentleman concluded by declaring that the romance was faithful to history, and history could not be judged by the tribunal. M. Johannes, the advocate of the Marquis d'Espinay Saint-Luc, contended that his client was a descendant of the famous Saint-Luc, and argued that M Dumas had exceeded the bounds of history. After hearing the Avocat du Roi, the tribunal delivered a judgment, by which it held that the romance called the "Dame de Montsoreau" had not been published with any intention of insulting or offending the plaintiff; that the famous Saint-Luc was a personage of history, and, as such, liable to be judged by writers; that such judgments, when not in violation of the penal law, are mere literary criticisms, and depend on public opinion; and, therefore, it dismissed the case, and condemned the plaintiff to the costs.

BRENTWOOD SCHOOL.

This School (which, from the manner in which it has been conducted, has obtained a most unenviable notoriety) was founded by Sir Anthony Browne, Kt. sergeant-at-law, by letters-patent dated 5th July, 4 & 5 William and Mary, for the free education of all the youth that might be offered to the master from any parish within three miles of the school-house, for him to instruct in "learning, virtue, and manners." There is a population of 30,000 inhabitants within the limited distance, and yet there are only two boys on the foundation, and these have but very recently become pupils. Sir A. Browne also left by his will almshouses at South Weald (the parish in which Brentwood is situated), in which five almspeople are allowed, under the present management, 3s. 10d. each per week, to exist on, in houses now little better than dungeons, although the great tithes of Dagenham, lately commuted at £1635 per annum, are left for their maintenance. The revenues of the School and Almshouses are about £1600 to £1600 per annum. This fine Charity has been so perverted, that the Commissioners of Charities were called on to investigate the abuses; and, on their report in 1835, an information was filed, and, after many vexatious delays, judgment was given in 1838 against the defendants, the corporation of the school with all costs of suit. Sir Charles Wetherell denounced it as one of the worst cases he had heard.

BRENTWOOD GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

A scheme was propounded for the better management of the charity, fourteen years since; but, through the changes in the Government, and not a little intriguing by interested parties, the scheme has been shelved; but, lately, some public-spirited individuals have brought the case before Parliament, (although strenuous means were taken to prevent it); and it is hoped, ere twelve months are passed, that Brentwood will be in the situation to rival Rugby or Bedford. The locality is beautiful, and the air is celebrated as the finest in the kingdom. The boys only are required to reside within the limits

Near the noble and ancient tree adjoining the school, and which overshadows it, William Hunter was burnt for his religious opinions, in the reign of Queen Mary.

Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to order and declare, that Ann, wife of Manaton Pipon, Esq., late a Captain in the 1st Regiment of Dragoon Guards (only sister of Robert Dennet, Baron Rodney), shall have, hold, and enjoy the same title, place, pre-eminence, and precedence, as if her late father, Robert Rodney, a Captain in the Royal Navy, had survived his brother Spencer, Baron Rodney, and had thereby succeeded to the title and dignity of Baron Rodney; and her Majesty hath been further pleased to command that the said royal order and declaration be registered in her College of Arms.

LOLA MONTES —Madame la Comtesse de Lansfeld of Bavaria, formerly Lola Montes, was condemned, on the 22nd of July last, to pay a sum of 2847*l.* 80*c.* to the creditors of a bankrupt named Marie Dumel, being the balance of an account for cloaks, visites, and other fashionable articles. In September, Mdlle. Lola put in an opposition to this judgment, on the ground that the sum demanded was exaggerated; and, in consequence of this opposition, the case had again to be submitted to the Civil Tribunal of Paris. It was called on yesterday, but Mdlle. Lola thought it beneath her dignity to appear, either in person or by counsel, and the Tribunal condemned the Countess to pay the whole sum demanded

TOMB OF GRACE DARLING.

THIS very interesting memorial to the intrepidity of woman in extreme peril has lately been raised in the churchyard of Bamborough, on the coast of Northumberland, where lie the remains of Grace Darling, whose great exertions at the wreck of the Forfarshire, in September, 1838, will long be remembered among many other instances of her heroic humanity. Poor Grace died of consumption, at an early age; she was a native of the ancient town of Bamborough, and was lodged, clothed, and educated at the school in Bamborough Castle, which is supported from the income of Lord Crewe's estates. The trustees of this property have subscribed liberally towards the expense of this monument; and her Grace the Duchess of Northumberland has contributed to the interesting work.

The monument, as our Illustration shows, is an altar tomb, upon which is the recumbent figure of Grace Darling, sculptured in fine Portland stone, and surmounted by a Gothic canopy, with six side and two end arches. The figure is represented lying on a platted straw mattress, bearing an oar, such as is peculiar to the Northumberland coast; and beneath the folds of the mattress, at the head, is introduced a kind of sea-weed, which is very abundant in the district.

The sculptor is Mr. C. Raymond Smith, of the New-road; the architect, Mr. Anthony Salvin; and the subscription has been raised under the management of Mr. Smeddle, steward of the Bamborough estate.

It may be interesting to add, that, in No. 125 of our Journal, we engraved another memorial to Grace Darling, placed in St. Cuthbert's Chapel, on Fern Island; to which are appended Wordsworth's touching lines, inscribed on the monument, to one

> "Pious and pure, modest, and yet so brave;
> Though young, so wise—though meek, so resolute."

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET

At length an effective and stirring five-act drama has been produced—one that bids fair to keep its place on the Haymarket boards for some time, and gain a far greater popularity than the so-called "legitimate" productions that have preceded it. There is no question of the success of "The Wife's Secret," played here, for the first time in England, on Monday evening. We say "for the first time in England," because the piece has already been acted often, and with great applause, in America, but was produced on our boards on the above night for the re-appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, who, once more, are numbered amongst the excellent company of the above theatre.

Let us speak first of the piece. It is written by Mr. Lovell, a gentleman well esteemed and known in the dramatic world as the author of "The Provost of Bruges," "Love's Sacrifice," "Look before you Leap," and other known productions. In point of interest and situation, arising from natural and simple incidents, this is by far the best piece he has yet written. There is no elaborated fine writing—no tedious interruptions of the action, to explain the mesaphysics of woman's heart, or the hazy subtleties of love, or envy, or passions altogether incomprehensible from their complexity—no gold-beater spreading of an idea, which former authors have condensed into the same number of words that the modern would-be high-school writer contrives to cover as many lines with. All is nature and probability. The characters talk as we ourselves might do in similar positions; the action is easily followed, and yet interests us greatly; and an exceedingly rare tact in dramatic construction is shown in riveting the attention of the audience by a series of ingenious situations, to the very last speech of the play, when the story and its result have been tolerably clear to every one of them from the very commencement. We will not say that the action might not have been brought together, and with increased effect, into three acts; but so long as the singular delusion exists that five acts are essential to the structure of a legitimate play, the author is compelled to shape his work to please conventional opinion. Let it be understood, however, that we do not object to five acts, or even more, provided there is a sufficiency of interest or situation to sustain them. But we think it a pity that many fine dramas are spoiled by reason of becoming tediously prolonged, because the exigencies of a present false taste require that their plots should be, at all inconvenience, stretched out to make the required number of acts.

The story of "The Wife's Secret" is simply this:—The time is the year 16—; the scene is laid on the coast of Dorsetshire, passing entirely on the estate of a colonel in the Parliamentary service, Sir Walter Aveyot (Mr. Charles Kean). Just before his return from the wars, his wife, Lady Eveline Aveyot (Mrs. Charles Kean), shelters her brother, a fugitive Cavalier, Lord Arden (Mr. Howe), in the mansion. An old Roundhead steward, designing and hypocritical, Jobez Sneed (Mr. Webster), whom Lady Eveline has checked in his accounts, during her lord's absence, becomes aware of this; and, to be revenged, plays the part of an Iago, and works on Sir Walter's feelings—hinting that some favoured lover is concealed in the house; and apparently proving his story by the revelation of a pendezvous, seen from the shrubbery through one of the windows, when Lady Eveline goes to visit her brother. Much misery is thus caused, Lady Eveline being ignorant that her husband is jealous, and merely imagining that he is aware of a Royalist concealed in the house. Nor does the terrible truth of Sir Walter's suspicion break upon her, until he taunts her roughly with her infidelity, and says that they must part for ever: at the same time he gives her a passport for the safe conveyance of herself and her supposed paramour to the coast. Whilst the final adieu is taking place—during which, also, the house, being suspected, is surrounded by the Parliamentary troopers—Lord Arden tries to escape. His flight is watched from the window by Sir Walter, who gives the word to "Fire," as Lady Eveline avows that the fugitive is her brother. The Cavalier falls from his horse, and his sister immediately confesses all, and reproaches Sir Walter with being his murderer. But almost directly Sir Walter reappears—"Heaven shields the brave gallant who fights for the Crown"—and his horse only has been hit. An explanation ensues—all are made happy, inasmuch as Sir Walter promises a certain pardon to his brother-in-law; and a neat admonition, concerning conjugal trusting and open-heartedness, concludes this very interesting drama.

For the acting, the principal praise must be awarded to Mrs. Charles Kean, whose performance portrayed all that could be wished of confiding love and gentleness in woman. It is no ill compliment to her to say, that her acting, when suspected, without daring to explain everything, was equal to that of Mrs. Keeley (of whom a word anon), when she played the carrier's wife, in the Christmas piece at the Lyceum, two years ago. Beyond this, however, she calls for the highest possible commendation. The manner in which she gave the words "Trust me," when appealing to her husband's confidence, deserved even more than the loud acknowledgment of its excellence which burst from the audience. No less admirable was her outburst of honest pride, when she found she was suspected; not a whit less touching was her gentle devotion and candour of innocence, in the earlier acts of the play. Mr Charles Kean was excellently suited in the character of Sir Walter Aveyot. An acute critic lately remarked, in speaking of the modern readings of Othello, that it was the mistaken custom of the actors to depict him as grave and lowering from his very entrance, as though he foresaw the circumstances of his misery. Into this error Mr Charles Kean did not fall. He appeared, at first, as returning a victor from the wars, full of hearty spirits and light but trusting love; and this additional effect was given to the exhibition of the access of jealousy and bitterness of heart that followed. In the scenes which called for these portrayals his acting was excellent, and called forth loud applause. Every point was honestly made and gained, and the hope was left, at the conclusion of his performance, that he might be witnessed in a character of similar effect, as soon as the run of the present drama had terminated. Mr. Webster, as the Steward, presented us with one of those artistical portraits for which he is so justly celebrated in every "make up" he undertakes. He looked as though he had walked out of a picture-frame in an old country house. His costumes and appearance, in the various characters he enacts, would form a valuable series for any required authority. Mrs Keeley's Maud—a Puritan waiting-maid—was inimitable played as only she herself could play it; indeed, it is a question whether her admirable by play in the scene in which Ardenis concealed, was not the prominent feature. Mr. Rogers played a French smuggler, rather after the old received style of broken English, than the modern correct delineation of Mr. Wigan or Mr. Ranger. Miss Reynolds was a page, but did not appear to advantage. She was too evidently the woman disguised; the ringlets might be dispensed with, and with great advantage, for the "Albeni" style of coiffure. And the sad little corked moustache done away with altogether.

The applause throughout the play was general, and honestly enthusiastic. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean were loudly called for; Mr. Webster announced the piece for repetition until further notice, amidst renewed cheering; the author was forced to bow his acknowledgments from his box; and, lastly, Mrs. Keeley and Miss Reynolds came forward, hand in hand, to answer the summons of the audience. In a word, "The Wife's Secret" is a "hit."

The bills of the theatres remain constantly the same, nothing new, with the exception of the above piece having been brought out.

Glück's "Iphigenia" will be the next opera at DRURY LANE, where it is already in rehearsal.

A new and original farce, by Mr. Oxenford, called "Dearest Elizabeth," is to be performed for the first time, this evening, at the HAYMARKET.

A five-act tragedy, "Diogène," was announced for production last evening at the ST JAMES' THEATRE, in which M. Bocage sustains the principal character.

Mr. Gustavus Brooke has been playing with undiminished effect at the OLYMPIC. "Macbeth" will be the next character in which he is to appear.

At the SURREY, Miss Rebecca Isaacs has been playing the leading characters in the Drury Lane operas with excellent success. There is a report that Mr. Bunn is about to quit the management of this theatre; we do not know with what foundation. "The Daughter of the Regiment" was repeated to good houses on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday; but we must call the attention of the Manager to an act of gross injustice to the public, in announcing Mr. H. Phillips to sing in the character of the Sergeant, and, on each of the above nights, substituting another performer, without any notice or explanation, leaving the audience to direct the change, and pay with the box.

"THE WIFE'S SECRET," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.—SCENE THE LAST.

"Twelfth Night" is in rehearsal at SADLER'S WELLS, in which Miss Laura Addison will play Viola.

The annual performance at Bath realised two hundred pounds, which was handed over to Mrs Macready. So successful was it, that it is in contemplation to repeat it at Bristol, which theatre is, we believe, under the same management.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

PARIS, Thursday.

The great event this week has been the opening of the Jardin d'Hiver, on Tuesday night, for musical and Terpsichorean amusement. The annual ball for the Royalists who, under the Charles X. dynasty, were pensioners on the Civil List, and who lost their incomes by the July revolution, was given at this garden for its inauguration. Fancies for its ball inclined the ladies of rank and station, and it is generally a very brilliant affair, the aristocratic aborigines of the Faubourg St. Germain showing, on this occasion, in great force. The tickets were sold at 20 francs each, and the receipts were nearly 50,000 francs. At nine o'clock the doors were opened, and the company continued to arrive until midnight.

I [illegible] many grand fêtes in various parts of the world, but nothing that I had ever before witnessed could compare with the astounding coup d'œil that struck me on entering the Garden. It was a perfect realisation of one of the most dazzling scenes described in the "Arabian Nights." The Jardin d'Hiver is situated near the Rond Point, in the avenue des Champs Elysées. It has been constructed by a company of speculators, at an enormous outlay. It is a vast conservatory or crystal palace, filled with magnificent exotic plants and statues, bronzes, fountains, rare plants, choice flowers, green turf, &c. It was lighted up with upwards of fifteen thousand wax tapers, and illuminated lamps, &c. Before you enter the garden of Paradise, you pass through elegant and capacious saloons. There is a genial warmth pervading the entire edifice, and the swans and ducks luxuriate in their warm baths with evident delight. Orange and lemon trees, pine apples, &c., are in full growth, and yet is this Winter Palace to be entered for the future at the price of one franc, with a first-rate orchestra for dancing. Strauss was the presiding genius on Tuesday night, with a band selected from the most eminent Parisian artists. There are rooms for journals, reunions, &c.; with golden fish sporting around you, acting, if you please, to observe the gay throng, or wafting a delicious garden, in the midst of grottoes. M. Charpentier is the magician under whose wand this Aladdin palace, this enchanted island of Artistic, and Gardens of Armida, as Florentine calls it, has been created. There is no describing which will be very necessary. It was quite evident that the temperature did not agree with the wax candles, and the melted drops fell on the elegant toilettes and black coats in profusion. If the Jardin be lighted with gas jets, the evil will be remedied.

There is little novelty in the operatic world. For Ronconi's benefit next Monday, "Il Barbiere" will be given, and selections from "Lucrezia Borgia." Mdme. Persiani's benefit will take place next week, and it is expected that Donizetti's "Lis la" will be performed. [illegible] and Mazilier, is in active progress at the Académie Royale. Auber's "Haydée" is drawing crowded houses nightly at the Opéra Comique, with Ingegny's powerful acting and beautiful singing. Renewed offers have been made to Grisi and Mario to join the Académie Royale.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

As the Racing Season will have commenced in less than six weeks, it is not premature to inquire what has been done for the Turf during the prorogation; and whether, in the interval, those who legislate for it have been Turning past evils to advantages.

Some correspondents of the sporting papers have handled rather roughly what they are pleased to call "the code of rules published by the Messrs. Tattersall." The new laws of the Subscription Room were not devised by those gentlemen: they are the enactments of the committee selected for the purpose, and worse than Augean chamber, and they are responsible for what they are doing, and also for what they neglect to do, should any lapsus be chargeable against them. So far as the admissions bear upon those gentlemen, with the public, every one may presently judge for himself, as, of course, a list of members will be published, with the names of those by whom each was proposed and seconded. Till that appears we are bound to suppose the erasure at Hyde Park Corner, on the afternoons of Monday and Thursday, sans peur et sans reproche.

Like its predecessor, '48 will be a great handicap anniversary. One of the early branches of entertainment will be the speculation which the two years have afforded; and if it be a sample of what is to follow, it will not require a conjuror to point out the horse that will lose, if there may be a difficulty in selecting the animal that will win. This is respectfully submitted to those who had this been done with the Newmarket Stakes, it could not have been worse for the holder of War Eagle. Does any body qualified to enter for a duck-hunt conceive the race for the last December Handicap to be run in the style of merits of the pair that ran for it? In their best respective forms last year, what weight would have brought the Hero and War Eagle together? The stakes which closed on New Year's Day have made their first appearance in the list as materiel, continue to advance. The nominations for the St. Leger of '47 amount to 143; there are 159 subscribers to the Chester Cup, 86 to the Manchester Trafford Plate, and 68 to the Great Yorkshire. Those who closed for '50 and '51 show that progress at still the watchword of that mighty meeting. The falling off is in the Great Metropolitan Stakes, the entry for which amounts but to 90. Considering the greatest number of prizes in England is added to this handicap, a very different field might have been anticipated. the nominations for the Northamptonshire Stakes, to which only £100 is added, are over 100. It seems difficult to account for the apathy with which the racing circles have responded to the energy displayed in their behalf by the licensed victuallers of London and the metropolitan districts. When the accessaries are cut for the great spring handicaps, we shall return to this subject. In the market business is still slack—very slack in reference to the early season that awaits it. The Derby will be run for on the 24th of May: only sixteen weeks to decide the momentous question—a man or a mouse! As soon as the odds assume any character of account, we shall analyse the data on which they ought to be founded

DISCOVERY OF ROMAN COINS AT MALVERN.—A recent discovery of Roman coins in Worcestershire has been made known by Mr. Jabez Allies, in the following interesting communication:—"A few weeks since a discovery of Roman coins was made in Little Malvern parish, on the western side of the road leading to Ledbury, and opposite to the premises called Little Malvern-priory, within half a mile of the foot of the Herefordshire beacon-hill. A party of visitors were rambling over the hills, and one of them struck his worn-pointed mountain-staff into the turf, just upon the margin of a stone quarry, at the spot described, causing the turf and stones, with an urn containing about 300 Roman brass coins, to fall amongst the rubbish beneath, from which they were picked out by various persons, and are now in the possession of Colonel Colston, Mr. Henry Trant, and in numerous other hands. All those which I have seen are of Diocletian, Maximian, or Constantius, and they are in very good condition. The urn, judging by the fragments which I have seen, had become much decayed, and nearly pulverised. I believe this is the first evidence of Roman occupation of the Herefordshire-beacon-camp. Some writers have supposed it Roman on account of the central præsidium, but it appears more probable that it was originally British, and afterwards occupied by the Romans, and adapted to suit their own purposes. The name Malvern is probably derived from Moely-yarn, signifying, in Welsh, the high court, or seat of judgment. Within half a mile from the spot where the coins were found, and at about the same distance from the camp, there is a place at the "Foot of the Wych," or, as it was, in old Saxon, Burswiers' Cross, in the parish of Colwall, near which the remarkable coronet or circlet of gold was found, in 1650: it was set with precious stones, reported to have been sold for £1,000. The particulars of this singular discovery are given in my 'Ancient British, Roman, and Saxon Antiquities of Worcestershire.' I have enclosed impressions from one of the coins, a large brass Maximian. Obv.: Imperatori Invicto, 'Maximiano Pio Felici.' Rev.: a genius, naked, holding the cornucopiæ and discus; 'Genio Popvli Romani,' and 'S. P.'"

ARRIVALS OF SPECIE.—The following arrivals of specie have just taken place The vessel Free Trade, arrived from Oporto, has brought two casks of specie, consigned to order; and the vessel Jane Boyd, arrived in the West Indian Docks from Colúja, has brought 11 boxes of the article, the whole of which were consigned to a firm of commercial eminence in the metropolis and elsewhere. This is the first arrival of this nature form the last-mentioned place during the recent influx of the article.

THE PORT OF GREAT GRIMSBY, in Lincolnshire, was once very extensive. In Edward the Third's reign it furnished eleven vessels for the armament against Calais; but, in subsequent years, it sank into extreme insignificance. Lately, the prospect of a railway improved its trade, and when these large docks are completed is likely to do so much more. In 1843 the customs revenue of Great Grimsby was £3232; in 1847 it has increased to £70,073. The railway from Louth is expected to open about March next.

side of it Thus, so far back as the fifteenth century, to come down no further, Paris had already worn out the three concentric circles of walls which, from the time of Julian the Apostate, lay in embryo, if I may be allowed the expression, in the Grand and Petit Châtelet. The mighty city had successively burst its four mural belts, like a growing boy bursting the garments made for him a year ago. Under Louis XI., there were still to be seen ruined towers of the ancient enclosures, rising at intervals above this sea of houses, like the tops of hills from amidst an inundation, like the archipelagoes of old Paris submerged beneath the new.

"Since that time Paris has, unluckily for us, undergone further transformation, but it has overleaped only one more enclosure, that of Louis XV., a miserable wall of mud and dirt, worthy of the king who constructed it, and the poet by whom it was celebrated

'Le mur murant Paris rend Paris murmurant.'

"In the fifteenth century Paris was still divided into three totally distinct and separate cities, each having its own physiognomy, individuality, manners, customs, privileges, and history the City, the University, and the Ville. The City, which occupied the island, was the mother of the two others, and cooped up between them, like—reader, forgive the comparison—like a little old woman between two handsome strapping daughters. The University covered the left bank of the Seine, from the Tournelle to the Tower of Nesle—points correspondingly, th. one with the Hall aux Vins, and the other with the Mint of modern Paris. Its enclosure encroached considerably upon the plain where Julian had built his baths. It included the hill of St. Geneviève. The highest point of this curve of walls was the Papal Gate, which stood nearly upon the site of the present Pantheon. The Ville, the most extensive of the three divisions, stretched along the right bank. Its quay ran, with several interruptions indeed, along the Seine, from the Tower of Billy to the Tower du Bois, that is to say, from the spot where the Grenier d'Abondance now stands to that occupied by the Tuileries. These four points, at much the same intersected the enclosure of the capital, the Tournelle and the Tower of Nesle on the left, and the Tower of Billy and the Tower du Bois on the right, were called, by way of eminence, 'the four towers of Paris.' The Ville penetrated still further into the fields than the University. The culminating point of the enclosure of the Ville was at the gates of St. Denis and St. Martin, the sites of which remain unchanged to this day."

Thus, the great divisions of Paris had three totally different aspects: the City abounded in churches; the Ville contained the Palaces; and the University, the Colleges. The City had the Cathedral of Notre Dame; the Ville, the Louvre and the Hôtel de Ville; and the University, the Sorbonne. The Ville contained the Halles; the City, the Hôtel Dieu; and the University, the Pré aux Clercs.

"In the fifteenth century that part of the Seine comprehended within the enclosure of Paris contained five islands: the Ile Louviers, then covered with trees, and now with timber; the Ile aux Vaches, and the Isle Notre Dame, both uninhabited and belonging to the bishop [In the seventeenth century these two islands were converted into one, which has been built upon, and is now called the Isle of St. Louis]; lastly, the City, and at its point the islet of the Passeur aux Vaches, since buried under the platform of the Pont Neuf. The city had at that time five bridges, three on the right, the bridge of Notre Dame and the Pont au Change of stone, and the Pont aux Meuniers of wood; two on the left, the Petit Pont of stone, and the Pont St. Michael of wood; all of them covered with houses. The University had six gates, built by Philip Augustus; these were, setting out from the Tournelle, the gate of St. Victor, the gate of Bordelle, the Papal gate, and the gates of St. Jacques, St. Michel, and St. Germain. The Ville had six gates, built by Charles V., that is to say, beginning from the Tower of Billy, the gates of St. Antoine, the Temple, St. Martin, St. Denis, Montmartre, and St. Honoré. All these gates were strong and handsome to, a circumstance which does not detract from strength. A wide, deep ditch, supplied by the Seine with water, which was swollen by the floods of winter to a running stream, encircled the foot of the wall all round Paris. At night the gates were closed, the river was barred at the two extremities of the city by stout iron chains, and Paris slept in quiet."

In the reign of Francis I. (1515) Paris assumed a new aspect. The old chateau of the Louvre, an assemblage of towers and heavy walls, was demolished, and a palace commenced on its site. Several churches were rebuilt, a Royal College for gratuitous instruction in the sciences and learned languages was founded; the fortifications enlarged and repaired; and the enabling of the Faubourg St. Germain, on the south side of the river, was commenced. Some of the streets were paved in this reign.

In the reign of Henry II., successor of Francis I. (A. D. 1547), the erection of the present Hôtel de Ville was commenced, but it was not finished till more than half a century afterwards.

In the reign of Charles IX. (A.D. 1566) the circuitor the walls was partially enlarged, so as to comprehend the palace of the Tuileries, then in course of erection by Catherine de Medici, the queen-mother.

In the time of Henry III., the whole population is estimated to have been 200,000, or upwards. The wars of religion, and their disastrous consequences, among which the Massacre of St. Bartholomew was the most conspicuous, arrested for a while the progress of letters and the fine arts; until Henry IV., having restored peace to the kingdom, greatly embellished the capital. During his reign, the Pont Neuf was finished; the Republic of St. Louis founded; the Place Royale and its streets, and the Place and Rue Dauphine, and the neighbouring quays, were laid out; great additions were made to the Palace of the Tuileries; and the splendid gallery which joins it to the Louvre was partly constructed. All the bridges, except the Pont Neuf, were at this time lined with houses

In the reign of Louis XIII. an immense number of religious establishments were founded at Paris The Palace of the Luxembourg was built by Marie de Medici, the Jardin des Plantes was laid out; and the Palais Royal was built, and the Academie founded by Cardinal Richelieu. New walls were erected on the north-west side of the city, extending the circuit nearly to the line of the present Boulevards. The island of Notre Dame, or St. Louis, was entirely covered with houses, and joined to the mainland by two bridges.

In the long reign of Louis XIV. (1643-1715), notwithstanding the protracted and disastrous wars of the Fronde, the projects of Henry IV. and Louis XIII. were completed. A great number of religious and charitable establishments were founded, and new churches and chapels built. Among the more remarkable of the charitable institutions were the immense workhouse, l'Hôpital Générale, or La Salpêtrière, and its dependency, the Bicêtre; and the hospital or asylum for old soldiers, known as the Hôtel des Invalides. Louis considerably altered the Louvre, completed the Tuileries, laid out anew the gardens of that Palace, and formed the public walk of Le Champs Elysées, and the places or squares of Vendôme, Les Victoires, and of the Carrousel. The triumphal arches of St. Denis and St Martin, and many fountains, were also erected at this time; the Observatory and several theatres were built; and the Pont Royal and Pont de Grammont were constructed. Boulevards, new streets, and quays were laid out; the police improved, and the streets lighted, though inefficiently. The population of Paris, at the close of the reign of Louis XIV., was fast approaching half a million.

Louis XV. erected the Palais Bourbon, and established the Ecole Militaire and the Ecole de Médecine; built the church of St. Geneviève (the Pantheon), and the Hôtel des Monnoies (or Mint), several market-places, fountains, and theatres; laid out the Place Louis XV., and commenced the erection of Pont Louis XVI. Paris was also, in this reign, surrounded by a wall, comprehending a much larger area than any previous inclosure, and designed to prevent the introduction of commodities without the payment of the octrois, or local taxes, at the six barrières, or gates.

Louis XVI. continued the church of St. Geneviève, commenced that of the Madeleine, and built St. Philippe du Roule and several others; he also adorned the Boulevards to the south, and the northern faubourgs of the city. The French Theatre, the French, Italian, and Comic Opera-houses, were built in this reign; old markets enlarged and new ones formed. Steam-engines were established on the banks of the Seine for supplying the city with water; and the Pont Louis XVI. was built. The galleries of the Palais Royal were furnished with shops; and the Mont de Piété was instituted. The new Boulevards and the villages of Chaillot, Les Ternes, and Monceaux were inclosed within the bounds of Paris, by which extension they were augmented to 1858 acres.

Paris was the principal scene of the Revolution, and, in its levelling fury, many monuments of the middle ages were demolished. In 1789 the Bastile was taken, and pulled down by the Parisians; the Tuileries was attacked; and the guillotine was erected on the Place Louis XV., between the gardens of the Tuileries and the Champs Elysées, the King himself being one of the earliest victims. They occasionally exceeded sixty in a day, and for hours after the executions, the ground at the place of execution was wet with blood. The guillotine was shifted from the Place Louis XV. to the Place de la Bastille, and from thence to the Place du Trône, at the eastern extremity of the city, from whence it was brought back to the Place Louis XV. for the execution of Robespierre and his associates (1794), with whom it put an end to "the reign of terror." To the Convention, the Polytechnic School, the Institute, and the Bureau de Longitude owe their establishment. Under the Directory, too, the Museum of the Louvre was opened; and, during the Consular and Imperial Government of Buonaparte, Paris assumed more than its former splendour. The Place du Carrousel was cleared of unsightly buildings; the Louvre was completed; the northern gallery, connecting the two palaces, was begun; the magnificent Rue de Rivoli was built; and the Rue Castiglione, connecting the latter with the Place Vendôme, Rue de la Paix, Boulevard, and Chaussee d'Antin, was designed and executed. Two new markets were constructed, three handsome bridges built, and new quays were formed on each bank of the river. An ample supply of water was secured to the capital; the Place de la Bastille was begun, and, near it, was raised a vast granary of reserve. The Bank of France was established, and a magnificent Bourse, or Exchange, was begun. Fifteen new fountains were erected, the Luxembourg Palace and garden improved and enlarged, and the column of the Place Vendôme was reared. Three great cemeteries were fixed without the barriers, and five public slaughter-houses, or abattoirs, were constructed at the extremities of the Faubourg. The churches devastated during the Revolution were repaired and embellished at the cost of more than four millions sterling in twelve years.

In 1814, Paris was captured by the Allied Forces, after a gallant defence by the troops of the line in garrison, supported by the National Guard and the students of the Polytechnic and Veterinary Schools. After the capitulation of the city, and the entry of the Allied Sovereigns, Napoleon was dethroned, and the Bourbon dynasty restored. Next year Napoleon returned to France, and received by the military at Paris with general joy; but the defeat of Waterloo brought the allied English and Prussian armies, under Wellington and Blucher, before the city. In consequence, Louis retired; Louis XVIII. re-entered Paris, and the Bourbon Government was restored. Louis continued with activity the improvements and embellishments of the capital; built the Chamber of Deputies, three new bridges, several barriers, and finished and enlarged markets; altogether, in this reign immense sums of money were expended on all parts of the city.

Under Charles X., the architectural alterations of Paris were chiefly of an ecclesiastical character. The church of St. Germain des Près was restored; the Madeleine progressed; and other new churches rose. Three new bridges were built; many of the passages that now embellish Paris were begun and the suburbs continued to increase rapidly

In the Revolution of 1830, which overthrew the Bourbon dynasty, and established that of Orleans, 4000 barricades were formed during the memorable three days' struggle: the relaying of the pavement torn up for this purpose cost above £10,000, and great numbers of the trees of the Boulevards were cut down.

Since the Revolution, the embellishment of the capital has received a new impulse. The Tuileries garden and palace have been much altered; quays have been widened and planted, several new bridges built, and handsome streets opened. Gallignani mentions up the improvements of this period—"The Hôtel de Ville has been quadrupled in size. The Madeleine, the churches of Notre Dame de Lorette, St. Vincent de Paule, and St. Denis have been finished; the Place de la Concorde has been completely remodeled and terminated, and the Obelisk of Luxor has been reared in its centre; the triumphal arch at the top of the Champs Elysées has been completed, as well as the magnificent palaces of the Quai d'Orsay and of the Fine Arts. Most of the public edifices of Paris that stood in need of repair have been attended to, and many restorations of the monuments of the middle ages are in progress." Vast drainage works are undertaken; gas is generally used throughout the town. "Works of great importance are in progress," says Galignani, "and more may be expected every year; the Government leads the way in this march of improvement, and what is undertaken by public authority is now not only begun, but quickly executed." We should add, that private enterprise has also, of late years, done much for the embellishment and improvement of the capital; and a vast number of handsome private houses have been erected, in some places forming almost entirely new districts

The Fortifications are the most recent public works in Paris; they were commenced in 1841, and are now completed as regards the walls and forts, but not their armament. They form a continuous enclosure, embracing the two banks of the Seine, mentioned and surveyed, with about 32 feet of escarpment, faced with masonry. There are also to be outer works, with casemates, besides several detached trenches. At different points are placed drawbridges, magazines, &c., and several military roads of communication have been formed. The distance of this belt from the octrol wall varies from 700 yards to 2 miles. These forts are to be armed by 2238 mortars, cannons, or howitzers, 575 rampart guns, 300,000 muskets, 1500 pièces de guerre, 3760 gun carriages, employing a million of projectiles, of various sorts. The artillery will have a range of 600 metres. It is stated in the French journals, that the forts of Charenton, Nogent, and St. Denis have already received their materiel of artillery.

Of Railways, there are eight, having stations in Paris, at present in operation. The population of Paris, at the last census, in 1846, was 1,053,897.

Victor Hugo in the "Hunchback of Notre Dame," published in 1828, says—"The Paris of the 15th century was already a gigantic city. We modern Parisians in general are much mistaken in regard to the ground which we imagine it has gained Since the time of Louis XI, Paris has not increased above one-third."

THE PICTURE.

The View, as already explained, has been sketched from the towers of Notre Dame, every face, every stone of which is a page, not only of the history of the country, but also of the history of art and science. The Roman abbey and the philosophical church—Gothic art and Saxon art—are all blended, combined, and amalgamated in Notre Dame.

Right and left, and in the centre distance, the river is crossed by bridges of various degrees of these, including several not to be seen from the point of our view, there are 27; Pont Notre Dame (40) being the oldest. The Pont Neuf (32), which crosses the two arms of the Seine, with the intermediate portion of the Isle of the City, scarcely exceeds our London bridge or Southwark bridge in length, and falls considerably short of Waterloo or Westminster; the other bridges are scarcely half the length of the Pont Neuf

The quays are a fine feature of the city; in some instances, as on the right of the picture, they are planted with trees; and in all cases they are flanked with lofty houses. The Hôtel de Ville, a fine specimen of the renaissance, is seen in the right hand corner. Higher up the river we see the Louvre and the Tuileries; and the beautiful façade of the Chamber of Deputies, just above the Pont de la Concorde

In the centre foreground of the Picture we see the wedge-like form of the Isle de la Cité, which Victor Hugo has so graphically described.

The Churches are too numerous for us to specify: here we have the proudly-swelling dome, the storied and multiform tower; the Gothic spire and the campanile; yet a hybrid mixture of the pointed and semicircular, and art of almost countless periods. And, about midway to the right, is the costly Grecian temple of La Madeleine, with its rich columns and colossal statues, finely-sculptured frieze, vast pediment and alto-relievo—the largest in existence.

The scene is richly studded with monuments of man's philanthropy, as well as of his piety. In the left distance is the Hôtel des Invalides, its good and wise object—to shelter the old and disabled soldier—but ill designated by the false glory of its huge gilt dome.

Of palaces, the centre of the view presents a magnificent nucleus in the vast piles of the Louvre and the Tuileries,—the Place once the scene of the gay tournament—the triumphal arch of Napoleon's gate of glory—the long galleries, covered with priceless gems of art, and, beyond these, the royal, yet public, palace gardens. Left of the Seine is the Luxembourg Palace, rich in the work of living artists—and now known as the Chamber of Peers. Elsewhere in the Picture may be seen the Palais Bourbon, the Palais de Justice, and the costly hotel, yet indicating rather by their vastness, than their beauty, the rank of their occupants.

To the right the Boulevards may be distinctly traced; and in the centre of the Picture, beyond the Tuileries, lies the Place de la Concorde, perhaps the most magnificent embellished area in the world. To this proud display of art succeed the Champs Elysees, terminated by the colossal Arc de l'Etoile, three-fourths of the height of our London Monument. Elsewhere are seen a few of the sculptured gates or arches of the city—strongly characteristic of the taste of a great military people,—and, in their classic delicacy, forming a sort of link between the past and the present—of ancient Gaul and modern France.

Another national edifice is the Ecole Militaire (1), to the left of the Invalides, thus suggesting the Alpha and Omega of military glory; whilst, in the far distance, are the fortified heights, portions of the vast defensive cordon which has been thrown around the good city of Paris. Two of the three Telegraphs are shown: one on the tower of St. Sulpice Church (12); and the other, almost in the extreme left distance, upon the church of St. Eustache (54), at Montmartre

Science, too, has her temples and palatial homes, as in the Institute, the Observatory, &c.; and Literature as well as Art, her long galleries, wherein are stored invaluable treasures. The Theatres are spacious and numerous, though of little architectural attraction.

Here and there are seen the ornamented Marchés, or Market-places, with their fountains and spacious areas, contributing to the health as well as the convenience of the city.

We cannot conclude better than with another page from Victor Hugo's charming work, recapitulating a few of the characteristics of the city, though, it should be recollected, by a worshipper of middle-age art

"There is the Paris of Catherine de Medici at the Tuileries; the Paris of Henry II. at the Hôtel de Ville; two fragments of the old royal city: the Paris of Henry IV. at the Place Royale—fronts of brick, with stone quoins, and slated roofs—tricoloured houses; the Paris of Louis XIII. at Val de Grace—a squat, clumsy style, scarcely paunch-bellied in the columns, and bunch-backed in the dome; the Paris of Louis XIV. at the Invalides—grand, rich, gilded, and cold; the Paris of Louis XV. at St. Sulpice—volutes, knots of ribbons, clouds, vermicelles, fisheries, and the Lord knows what all in stone; the Paris of Louis XVI. at the Pantheon—a wretched copy of St. Peter's at Rome; the Paris of the Republic at the School of Medicine—a poor Greek and Roman style, resembling the Colosseum or the Parthenon as the Constitution of the year 3 does the laws of Minos—it is called in architecture the Mesandor style; the Paris of Napoleon at the Place Vendôme—this is sublime—a column of bronze made of cannon; the Paris of the Restoration at the Exchange—a very white colonnade supporting a very smooth frieze; the whole is square, and cost twenty millions."

PRISON NO PUNISHMENT.

The management of the poor and destitute was always a difficulty, but it seems to be verging every day towards the impossible. The accounts of the destitution that exists in the City of London are becoming frightful: it is not the ordinary phase of poverty that London furnishes to the observer; it is poverty plus vice of all kinds, poverty rooted like a poisonous weed in a soil of ignorance that has become fertile of nothing but crime. There is a poverty that suffers unheard and unseen, that sickens, crawls to its den, and dies:—that is the saddest, but its amount is never known. There is another poverty that rebels, that declares a little war on society, that begs always, either by whining or by threats, as the case may be; that robs when it has a chance; that bullies all "authorities," from the Lord Mayor to the pauper gate-keeper; that prefers a prison to the workhouse, and entitles itself to the desired admission there by destroying the property of those already heavily taxed by poor-rates; that keeps the police offices in constant employment, and fills the columns of the newspapers with cases that reveal a savage brutality among many of the roamers of the streets of this rich metropolis, that cannot be found, at least is not displayed, in any other city in the world.

It is, perhaps, fortunate that the violence of what may be called the savage destitute is displayed in destroying property rather than life; but, though not so alarming as homicide, the constant destruction of valuable property—partly as if in revenge on all above the miserable level of the destroyer, partly to open a way to shelter and food—is a feature of modern society not to be overlooked. It is a modern abuse, great and increasing; it almost amounts to a new crime; and it has lately been perfected and brought into a system. A destitute wretch, without a home, is refused admittance to the legal refuge of the poor; or, being admitted, finds the fare of a workhouse far worse than that of the prison; he soon learns there is a way of violating the law that will secure him a term of imprisonment; so a paving-stone demolishes the plate-glass window of a city tradesman, the police arrests, the magistrate sentences, the prisoner carries his point, and all parties are satisfied (for the magistrate has "done his duty") except the owner of the window, who is made poorer by several pounds, without possibility of redress; his property is not stolen, but destroyed. The locality most subjected to this persecution is the City, and particularly the vicinity of the Mansion House. The banking-house of Smith, Payne, and Smith, is an especial mark for pauper lapidation; a rumour has sprung up, that the firm keeps a glazier lodged on the premises. The dwelling of the "Lord of the City" has also been an object of preference to these destructives; some of the windows have had to be replaced more than once. Altogether, though it is in the City that a "smash" of any kind is most disliked, it is precisely there that they are most frequent.

We would not speak lightly of the subject if we thought this wanton destruction was the result of genuine suffering, poverty, if it was the despair of grinding destitution fallen on the industrious. But these outrages are not committed by the honest poor; it is a trade taken up by those whose greatest dread is that of being set to work. They break windows for a livelihood rather than break stones, and the law ensures them their wages—food, and lodging in a prison. It appears, too, that this class of destructives have generally been born and reared in pauperism, that they are the children of the law, such as it is; the authorities have had the full control of them from their birth, and have made nothing out of them but a kind of social savages, Arabs of the City, preying where they can and destroying what they cannot seize or turn to account. There is one gang of women who keep the parish officers in a perpetual state of terror who are all parish bred; it makes one curious to know what is parish teaching? The answer must be very unsatisfactory, if training in youth has any influence at all; or, we are thrown for a solution on an admission that there is an innate depravity in the very nature of these unfortunates which no possible training could have changed—that they are like Caliban, who could take "no print of goodness," while he was "capable of all ill." But Caliban was a monster, and even a workhouse school deals with human beings. Here, however, parish, or rather public culture has failed to produce any good fruit. They have not even been taught to work in that house "misnamed of industry." By the testimony of the authorities, it appears that these women have had situations repeatedly provided for them, but would stay in none; they seem to be impressed with the notion that, as society began to support them at their birth, it is bound to do so till the end.

The suggestions of remedies, as in most other cases of evil, are numerous, but most of them, as is usual also, are not practicable. It is proposed to lower the prison diet to the workhouse level; but medical authorities declare it impossible for men in confinement to live in health on a very low dietary; if society imprisonees a man, it must feed him well, or imprisonment becomes sentence of death. As the regulations of workhouses are sufficiently prison-like, the better diet of the abode of crime is a difference in favour of it; the modern improvements in warming and ventilation which have been adopted in some prisons, give also a feeling of comfort not unnaturally envied by those who can appreciate the value of a shelter when given them, though they will not work, and can care for themselves. Whether for the short term, which is generally awarded as the punishment of these paupers of the "malicious" sort, a reduction of the prison fare, and other lessenings of the comforts of incarceration, might not be tried, is worth considering. Some call for increased severity of punishment is very excusable in the shopkeeper sitting amid the fragments of his showy window front: but in what way is it to be increased? Lengthening the term of imprisonment would only increase the temptation to qualify for it; if the asylum is desired for a short time, it will be still more desired for a long one. The Legislature would scarcely rank window breaking with homicide, or felony of the grossest kinds; and we have observed a tendency lately to revert to corporal punishment for offences of this class, which must not be encouraged: it is an extreme resource to barbarism. Flogging is being recommended for minor offences by men, and petty thefts by boys; but, we apprehend, the most zealous for the repression of window smashing as a profession are not prepared to advocate the application of corporal punishment to women, who appear to be the chief foes of the "pane public."

Still the terr ble depravity of these paupers by profession should not make us forget the vast amount of real destitution that, at this season of the year, is wandering the streets absolutely shelterless. It is on the "casual poor" that the administration of the Poor-Law bears with the greatest harshness. It is they who are bandied about between Union and Union, unable to prove their title to relief, to officers hardened by custom into suspecting every one; it is against them the forms required before relief can be given operate most fatally. To be shut out from one workhouse, with an intimation that he must walk some miles to another, in this inclement weather, [illegible] that the stranger [illegible] to many men [illegible] ranks of "casuals," [illegible] the [illegible] Houses. For this class something [illegible] required—some asylum where the title to warmth and shelter shall be the want of both, proved by asking for them. Such are the "Asylums for the Houseless," which have just commenced their operations for the winter. We understand the funds of the Institutions are insufficient; but we cannot believe that, in such a trying season as this, the public will allow a most useful charity, thus simplies a defect of our legal system, to be impeded in its course for want of means.

THE INSURRECTION AT PALERMO.

THE dissatisfaction that has so long prevailed in Sicily has, at last, broken out into open rebellion; the whole island may be said to be on fire, though the centre of the insurrection is the city of Palermo. The following details are derived from the correspondence of the Débats, the organ of the French Government which would not ever ate the extent of a disturbance so dangerous to the Royal Family of Naples

"Letters from Naples, of the 15th, announce that, on the 12th, an insurrection of movement of a sufficiently grave character had broken out at Palermo. For some time it had been publicly said in Sicily, at Naples, and even throughout Italy generally, that if, upon the Birth-day of the King of Naples, the long-promised reforms were not declared, the people of Palermo would take up arms and wrest them by force. A proclamation was circulated generally in Palermo, on the 11th, which, calling the people that the 12th was the day on which the insurrection [illegible] The Governor of [illegible] fell into the error of treating lightly an insurrection thus announced beforehand.

"Upon the morning of the 12th crowds began to assemble at Palermo, against which were directed, in the first instance, some weak detachments of gendarmes, from whom the people easily took their arms and uniforms. A few shots were [illegible] were next ordered out, who dispersed the crowd without firing a shot; but, the latter, returning to the charge, the officers withdrew the soldiers into their barracks. In the evening the insurgents bivouacked in the town [illegible] the Duc de Mogar remained master of the movement, it was much feared that, on the following morning, the mountaineers would come down and join the inhabitants. Already, at the commencement of the movement, a band of the peasants of Monreale had come into the town, but had been dispersed by the troops.

"It was said at Naples that, upon certain points, the fighting had been very brisk; and, it was affirmed, that the women of Palermo had not shown less animosity than the men against the Neapolitan soldiery.

"The serious nature of the intelligence from Palermo was not made public [illegible] but the Governor did not see a moment in sending off troops. The [illegible] offering on the day of the 14th, remained at the Fort of Naples, from eight in the morning till four, while 10 battalions of 600 men each [illegible] were embarking. Nine steamers sailed with these troops for Sicily, other troops were directed towards Foggia, and little doubt was entertained that such an amount of force would master the insurrection."

The Semaphore of Marseilles has the following from Naples, dated the 14th instant:—"The Vesuve steam packet, which left Palo mo yesterday, brings accounts of a general insurrection on the 12th in all the principal towns of Sicily. At Palermo the exasperation was so great that ladies threw from their windows all sorts of furniture upon the Dragoons who were charging upon the people. Thirty thousand citizens of Palermo, all armed, drove the troops out of the town, after having caused the n great losses. The troops succeeded in reaching Monte Reale. We are assured that the infantry of the line would not take part in the movement. The King of Naples, on receiving this news, was so much agitated that a moderate bleeding was necessary; but, in the evening, he sent off 3000 soldiers of the line, in nine steamers, from Sicily. On the 13th, the King's fête day, his Majesty went to the theatre of San Carlos, where some applause having been commenced by the friends of the Court, it was responded to by hisses from the boxes and pit. It is reported that the King's son, having demanded concessions for the people, has been put under arrest. The Vesuve could not land her cargo at Palermo, she merely landed a few passengers, and then left for Naples without waiting for letters."

The following extract from a letter dated Naples, the 15th inst., confirms the above accounts, with fuller particulars: "In the morning of the 12th, on the salvos of artillery announcing the anniversary of the King's birth-day, a population spread in masses through the city, and barricades were formed at several points, under the protection of armed men. The police totally gave way before this imposing movement: a part of the troops remained in the town and took up a position at the foot of the Monte Pellegrino, the rest remaining in the forts. All remained in this state until eleven o'clock, when, a few minutes after that hour, a strong detachment of cavalry debouched by the gate of Saint Antonio, to disperse an assemblage collected in front of the palace of the Intendant. The cavalry was hailed with cries of friendship and fraternity, but they fired, and killed one man, wounding many others, whose cries of pain were received by loud cries of vengeance from the infuriated people, who rushed upon the detachment, brought many to the ground, and compelled the rest to sound a retreat. The attitude of the populace became [illegible] the few troops left in the city retired, leaving the insurgents masters of it, and who occupied themselves in strengthening their positions. One battle has attended this insurrection, and proves the accord which reigns upon all the classes of the people. The Clergy mingled themselves among the armed parties, incessantly preaching to them sentiments of patriotism, and exciting them not to depart, even in the hour of battle, from that spirit of moderation and humanity which are the distinguishing marks of our religion. Some of the Priests were seen encouraging, by voice and gesture, those [illegible] were working at the barricades. In the evening an Englishman arrived at Palermo with despatches from the British Consul, and after went o[illegible] with most of the English residents. At night the city was entirely illuminated [illegible] were ligated on the tops of all the surrounding elevations. Some hours later, between 7000 and 8000 mountaineers, well-armed, entered Palermo in good order. The Vesuve returned to Naples at five in the afternoon of the 13th, with despatches from the King's lieutenant. On the following day troops arrived by the railroad from Capua and Nocera to the amount of 8000 men, and were entrenched in nine steam-frigates, which immediately steered for Sicily. In the evening of April Ferdinand himself started in the steam-frigate the Roberto. Placards were posted during the night, at every corner, called upon the Neapolitans to [illegible] runs to [illegible] Sicilians. The rising of the people of Trapani [illegible] more than that of Palermo—they have repelled the Royal [illegible] ession of the castle. On the morning of the insurrection [illegible] the commercial steamer, Il Capitan del Grado, on which they [illegible] and which was sent to make a tour of the island to excite to revolt all the maritime towns. This perfectly succeeded. At Trapani, Catania, [illegible] the inhabitants were found in arms on the approach of the steamer. The provisional government at Palermo distributed freely money and arms. Catania, Messina, and Melazza, have not been less fortunate. Everywhere success has crowned the efforts of the insurgents. It is reported, also, that there is an insurrection in the Abruzzi and Puglia, but this news requires confirmation. The news has produced a profound sensation in Naples, but there has been no outbreak."

The Turin journals, which have just reached us, contain accounts from Naples of a more recent date, and of great interest, for it appears by them that the insurgents had made a very vigorous [illegible] took up the troops recently arrived, and had poured forth a discharge of [illegible] shot, which had greatly thinned their ranks. The commander of the British Pirate is said to have declared that he would immediately land the rest of the squadron to bombard the rebels, if any attempt were made to bombard the town until the full value of all the English property in it should be ascertained, to compensate for less that might ensue. The popular movement, which began in Palermo, was still great, and the insurrection appeared to be acting with organisation as well as vigour. The provisional government consists of Dr Lauzieri Septimo, who was Minister for Foreign Affairs under the Constitution of 1812; Prince Villafranca, Advocate Marrocco, and Colonel Pietro Aceto. It is mentioned as a proof of the popular feeling, that a female, the wife of a man whose brother has enjoyed a leading part in the late manifestations, has raised a force of 600 men, which she herself commands. The priests too were come about the town exhorting the people to struggle for their rights.

We have engraved, upon the preceding page, one of the principal streets of Palermo, showing one of the [illegible] increase in number, that dell'Olivella, or Santa Rosalia Pass. The town lies on the northern coast of Sicily, and is surrounded with walls, furnished with bastions. The houses are built with low roofs and flat terraces. The streets are straight, and there are several squares. Among the most remarkable buildings is the Royal Palace, in the castell ed style of the fourteenth century; the Observatory; the Cathedral, a splendid Gothic structure; several churches, mostly deserving of notice; the University; the great Hospital, noble palaces, &c.

FRANCE

The King of the French has resumed his receptions. On Monday evening last his saloon was crowded with visitors; nearly all the Ambassadors and their ladies and the Ministers and their ladies were present. The King appeared to be in good health. It is said that he was well to some of his visitors but then public; that his affliction at the loss of his son had rendered the rigorous seclusion necessary. He gave occasion also to believe that, should anything this event, the personal parties at the Tuileries would commence in February, as the tradesmen of Paris complain bitterly of the stagnation of trade, cause by the aristocracy in not giving balls and soirées, for which the example of the Court is necessary.

The debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the "sale of an office of reference" in the Court of Accounts, encouraged and sanctioned by M. Guizot, referred to on Friday (last week), by a vote in his favour. M. de Peyramont, one of the sons of his Ministerial colleagues, moved the following order of the day: "That the Chamber, confiding in the wise expressed by the Government, and in the efficacy of the measures proposed to prevent the [illegible] of a long-standing and lamentable abuse, passes to the order of the day." MM. Barbaroux and Lherbette, pointed, in the name of the Opposition, a counter-solution to this effect:—"The Chamber, scared and dissatisfied, does the debate on the incident, and passes to the order of the day." The latter, having been first put to the vote, was rejected by a majority of 225 to 146, and the order of the day, proposed by M. Peyramont, was afterwards adopted by the Assembly.

In the general discussion on the Address, commenced in the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, after M. Duchâtel, Minister of the Interior, in reply to previous speakers, observed, that the Cabinet had never avoided discussion, but was not bound to reply to every futile [illegible] made against it.

According to the returns of the production and consumption of domestic sugar published by the Minister of Finance, the number of manufactories in operation on the 1st of January, 1848, was 396; the quantity of sugar manufactured, or in course of manufacture, on the 1st of January, 1848, was [illegible]; that sold for consumption, 50,514,604; and the duty levied on the article amounted to 18,952,726 f.

The Moniteur publishes the returns of the imports and exports of France in 1847. The Customs Duties exhibit a diminution of 19,84.,178f., as compared with those of 1846, having only amounted to 134,117,730f.

The number of French vessels which entered the harbours of France in 1847 was 7835, measuring 1,861,104 tons: the foreign vessels, 13,303, measuring 1,890,538 tons: in all 21,138 vessels and 3,751,889 tons. The French vessels which cleared in 1847 were 7829, measuring 1,874,341 tons; the foreign vessels, 7814, measuring [illegible] tons: in all 15,939 vessels and 1,750,061 tons. As compared with the navigation of 1846, there was a decrease in 1847 of 343 in the number of French vessels which entered the harbours of France, and an increase of 27,143 tons; and an augmentation of 1190 in that of foreign vessels, and of 216,648 tons. The number of French vessels which sailed from France also presents a diminution of 170, whilst the foreign increased by 984.

The Queen of the French held a Drawing-room on Monday night. The King appeared well, but coughed a little. That the Government is uneasy at the state of public opinion is proved by the fact that the Ministers have sent in writ of prosecution against the Constitutionnel. The smokers' shops were visited, to enforce the orders formerly given to keep the [illegible] exposed for sale without locks.

The Committee appointed to examine the Address of the 221 on the 24th, has published a circular declaring that, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Prefect of police of the Government, the banquet should take place. The Committee says that the law is [illegible] even when the right to assemble and the right to assemble a meeting is for a temporary purpose, not confined to the expression of thoughts and opinions. An association is a continuous act, and a permanent meeting. The Committee declares that it is resolved, that no dinner will not take place until the debate on the Address is over, in order to afford Deputies the opportunity of being present, and that it shall be seen whether Government will dare to disperse by force an assembly [illegible] the law of the force. If so, an appeal will be made to the tribunals for a judicial decision upon the law as it stands.

ITALY.

A funeral ceremony has been celebrated in the Church of St. Lombards at Rome, for the Milanese killed by the Austrians on the 22nd. The Pope had permitted that demonstration, which the Austrian Ambassador had in vain endeavoured to prevent.

M. Morichini, the Roman Minister of Finance, has presented to the Consulta a project of law for the [illegible] of a loan of Roman [illegible] scudi (£214,800 sterling). The Consulta has approved on condition—1st. That the clauses of the contract shall be examined by it; 2nd. That the mortmain chest shall be re-established; 3rd. That the Consulta commence from to-day to examine the expenses, and, above all, to sanction the payment of the rents accorded without any just motive, since 1815, to the religious corporations, as well as the pensions granted by favour and not by right.

The Court of Naples has pronounced its judgment relative to the persons who took part in the demonstrations of the 14th of December last, which has been received with general surprise. It condemns to the galleys for life the inhabitants of Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom, whose welfare and security in the enjoyment of their rights have always been protected and assured by the Austrian Government. We also find the valiant and faithful attachment of our people, whose greatest glory has always been and always will be to show themselves the most devoted supporters of our throne, and the rule of conduct which they have followed and always bring down on the persons and properties of peaceful citizens.

"Vienna, Jan. 9"

The Journal de Francfort of the 15th inst. announces that the students of the University of Pisa had voted by acclamation an address to the Civic Guard of Leghorn, to congratulate them on their conduct during the recent disturbances in that city.

SWITZERLAND.

Sir Stratford Canning has presented a memorandum to the President of the Diet, recommending the Swiss Government, in the most friendly manner, to hasten a general amnesty, and to abstain from any measure of precaution in dealing with the revision of the Federal Compact.

A note from the French Government to the Diet, of the 18th instant, is published. It is of a very strong [illegible] menacing character, asserting the cantonal sovereignty as the basis of the federal pact guaranteed by the great Powers.

The memorandum of Sir [illegible] Canning has produced a good effect. One of the fruits of it was witnessed in the Diet on the 20th, when an attempt to compel the people of Lucerne to maintain the Federal Constitution was frustrated by the [illegible] of a majority. It is understood that the resolution to revise the Federal Compact will be persisted in, but that the period for discussing it will be postponed.

DENMARK.

The illness of the King has terminated fatally according to the most recent accounts from that country. The Weser Journal announces the death of his Majesty Christian VIII., King of Denmark; and although nothing has as yet been received Hamburg officially on the subject, the event is generally believed. The death of the King of Denmark, in ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances, would be regarded as an event of little consequence; but it [illegible] importance from the well-known dissensions between the Danish Kingdom and her German provinces, and the peculiar habits, opinions, and character of the late King.

Christian VIII. King of Denmark and Duke of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg, died on the 19th [illegible] at Copenhagen. King Christian VIII was born on the 18th December 1786, and succeeded to the throne on December 3, 1839. He was first married, in 1806, to the Princess Charlotte Frederica, of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, from whom he was divorced in 1812; and afterwards to the Princess Caroline of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. The Crown Prince, Frederick Charles Christian, was born on the 6th of October, 1808. His first wife was the Princess Wilhelmina Mary of Denmark, from whom he was divorced in 1837, and his second the Princess Caroline of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, from whom he was also divorced in 1846. The Crown Prince had no issue by either wife.

SPAIN

The Chamber of Deputies has voted the authorisation to Ministers to collect the taxes up to the end of June next by a majority of 141 to 37.

Generals Narvaez, Cordova, and Figueras returned the visit of General Espartero on the 13th. General Espartero has also waited on Mr. Bulwer, who had been confined several days to his room by indisposition.

At Madrid the influenza continues to rage. On the 19th inst. four of the Ministers were confined to their beds by the malady, viz: the Duke of Valencia (Gen. Narvaez) and Sotomayor; M. Beltran de Lis and M. Sartorius. Their illness was not of a dangerous character, but, generally speaking, the mortality was great. As many as 122 persons have died in one day.

HOLLAND

The Government has just published its budget of receipts and expenses for the year 1848. The extraordinary receipts amount to f.57,734 96; and the ordinary receipts are estimated at f.79,664,400, making a total of f.79,687,214. Thus the budget for 1848 presents a surplus of f.8,698 61½.

PRUSSIA

The General Committee of the States of Prussia was opened at Berlin on the 18th inst. in the Hall of the Council of State. The Minister of the Interior, M. de Bodelschwing, as Royal Commissioner, accompanied by the other Ministers, attended and explained that the Committee was convoked in order to give its counsel on the subject of a project of law prepared in accordance with the views already expressed by the provincial Diets.

RUSSIA.

Accounts from St. Petersburg of the 14th inst., state that the Emperor and the Imperial Crown Prince, although convalescent, had not been able to receive on the occasion of the new year. The Governor of Kostroma was expected in that capital, and was to be presented to the Emperor, would seem to implicate him with the Polish incendiaries who resided at Kostroma.

BELGIUM.

The mortality in Antwerp of late, as in other places, has been excessive as compared with that of preceding years. The report of the week from the 1st to the 21st inst. announces 81 deaths and only 51 births, being an excess of 30 deaths. From this the mortality in the first half of the month exceeds the number of births by nearly one-half. During these 22 days there have been 318 deaths and 168 births. In the civil hospital especially, the mortality is fearfully great.

GERMAN STATES

KINGDOM OF WURTEMBURG.—A public meeting of the citizens was held at Stuttgard, the capital, on the evening of the 16th instant, at which a number of resolutions were adopted, to demand certain reforms from the Government: the principal of which were Liberty of the Press, the repeal of duty on raw materials, and on sugar, tea, and other articles of subsistence coming from other countries, a universal commercial code for all Germany, trial by jury and in public, the abolition of certain taxes, and many other reforms of a similar nature. The meeting was attended by many of the deputies [illegible] and Switzerland.

TURKEY

The friendly relations between the Turkish and Greek nations have been resumed, and the Greek flag once more floats on the Greek Consulate at Constantinople. M. Museurus had a private audience of the Sultan on the 3rd, and was to leave in two or three days for Athens, on board a Turkish frigate. Cases of cholera still occurred at the Ottoman capital, but of a mild description.

INDIA.

Letters in anticipation of the Overland Mail have been received. The intelligence thus obtained is of little interest. That supplied from Calcutta represents the disastrous effects of the late commercial embarrassments in London upon the mercantile community in that Presidency. Nine highly respectable firms had been compelled to suspend payment, and it was impossible to calculate how far the serious consequences of these failures would extend.

The Punjaub and Scinde were tranquil. Lord Hardinge was expected to leave Calcutta early in this month (January). Commercial matters had begun to assume a more healthy aspect, with an appearance of a gradual improvement.

CHINA

The accounts from China are entirely of a peaceful nature; [illegible] the feeling of the people of that Empire towards the Europeans continued favourable. A partaking of a more pacific character. His Excellency Sir John Francis Davis had returned to Hong Kong from his mission to the coast of Cochin China, where he had gone for the purpose of accomplishing some commercial arrangements.

His Excellency Mr. Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, having suffi ciently recovered from the serious attack of fever, which is likely to become a important to the agricultural interest as guano. The article is called "Tremoco" or "Lupens," and it is said to be the richest vegetable manure discovered in the world. It grows in the sand of the Landes, before or about blossoming, is dug up and spread on the land with earth, when it rots in two or three weeks, and the land becomes loose and rich for every agricultural purpose.

[illegible]ary and Bonnemain, who were lately tried by the Court of Assizes of the Seine, France, to ten and eight years reclusion for perjury, have implored the Royal clemency. In compliance with the demand of the Minister of Justice, the Procureur-General of the Court of Paris has given his opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of according any indulgence, but no decision of the Minister has yet been submitted to the Kin

LOSS OF THE "ARGO," OF LIVERPOOL. A Despatch has been received at Lloyd's, from the Foreign Office, enclosing copy of letters received by Lord Palmerston, from her Majesty's Consul at the Cape of Good Hope, which reports the wreck of the "Argo," of Liverpool, from Liverpool to Monte Video, coal laden. She struck upon a sunken rock, off the island of Mayo, and afterwards drifted on the mainland crew saved.

NAVIGATION LAWS. Mr. Henry Tyndall, Esq., the extensive shipowner, of London, has transmitted a bank post bill of £50 to William Richmond, Esq., of Tynemouth, for the purchase of a piece of plate, to remain as a testimony of his approbation of the clear and able manner in which he stated the case of the shipowners of England whilst under a long and harrassing examination before the Committee of the House of Commons on the Navigation Laws during the last session of Parliament.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENCES. Some practical suggestions upon this all-absorbing topic are to be met with in a pamphlet published by Ridgway, and bearing the name of Mr. Mallins upon the title-page. The author, who served during the campaigns of 1811 to 1815 in the Peninsula and America, would construct an ordnance railway at or near the Mother Bank, to convey the vulnerable parts of the coast capable of carrying guns of the heaviest calibre. With the aid of this prodigious mechanical power it would be easy to concentrate at the point of danger, in the shortest possible time, any number of heavy guns, and thus arrest, on breaking foot where he would be assailable from both services, viz., the heavy artillery of the steam fleet, which would thus gain time to come up from the harbours of refuge (supposing, for the moment, that the dark or in a fog), and the superior fire of guns thus brought to bear from the shore. The great recommendation urged in favour of this plan seems to be its economy of time, men, and money. The author does not enter into any calculation of expense, but the [illegible] of the proposition to Government as worthy of consideration. Mr. Mallins suggests a most line of electric telegraph, as the means of instantaneously indicating the point of danger.

MR. CRAIG'S OPINIONS RESPECTING THE CURRENCY.—Mr. Bennoch, the Chairman of the "Anti-Gold-Law League," has published some correspondence which has passed between Mr. Craig, of Leeds, and himself. This correspondence was [illegible] by a letter from Mr. Bennoch, requesting Mr. Cobden to grant an interview to him and Mr. Taylor. To this letter Mr Cobden replied by expressing his regret that he could not comply with the request, but from seeing Mr. Bennoch, by requesting that gentleman to tell him, in the compass of a dozen lines, what was the plan recommended by the Anti-Gold-Law League, or the Birmingham scheme. Mr. Bennoch, in reply, says:—"You speak of free trade in gold as one of your objects, but I consider the import and export of gold already free." In answer to this letter, Mr. Bennoch forwarded another epistle, containing certain propositions, which he stated to represent the principles of the Anti-gold law League; and elicited the following reply from Mr. Cobden:—"Manchester, Dec. 21, 1847.—Dear Sir, If you direct your gold fountains to the Mint, as every one points out, and thus arrest in the bud the evil, you will see that the cure is a simple one. I am sure you will see a fallacy in the idea that the price of gold is fixed at all in this country. It is merely weighed, assayed, and stamped as of a certain quantity and fineness, in the same way as bar gold or ounce being divided into certain coins of invariable quantities and fineness. You say, 'suppose some gigantic corporation, or which Parliament [illegible] of certain exclusively privileges, were compelled to buy all corn offered to it at £3 17s. 9d. per quarter, and obliged to sell it at £3 17s. 10½d., whatever the amount of labour condensed in its production, would you consider the trade in corn free?' This is not the case of gold. The question is, whether the corn should be subjected to an invariable measure of quantity? For this purpose the law has fixed on the imperial bushel, which contains a fixed and invariable quantity. And in the case of gold it has done no more than its coins the weight and fineness of gold. I will not follow the subject further, for I am sure, if you bring your mind to a consideration of the point, you will understand it perfectly. I remain, &c., RICHARD COBDEN." This reply drew two other letters from Mr. Bennoch, in which he advocates his opinions at great length, encloses a speech of Mr. Urquhart on Mr. Cobden's pursual, and expresses his intension of publishing the whole correspondence.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The subject of the last meeting, on ancient Greek vases, was resumed on Wednesday evening. "A report on the mathematical and geometric proportion of the ancient Greek vases recently excavated by Dr. Harding, from the tombs near Hexalmi, on the Isthmus of Corinth, by Mr. Scott Russell," was read, and the discussion continued. Mr. Russell, in setting forth his opinions in reference to the principles upon which the elegant forms of the ancient Greek vases were based, stated that, although the theories advanced by some persons to the effect that the beauties in works of art were derived from natural forms, such as leaves of trees, &c., yet it was manifest, from the readiness with which persons selected those leaves which approached nearest to their own pre-conceived notions of beauty, that there must have existed in the mind some intuitive knowledge which rendered any such assistance altogether unnecessary. In proof of the truth of this, it was a fact that, a person searching for a leaf would find even a vast number on the same tree before meeting with one that entirely came up to his own standard of beauty. He was, therefore, not at all disposed to recognise the adoption of any such theories as the regulator of the elegant outlines peculiar to works of Greek and Etruscan nature. Those works were dependent upon mathematical principles, and were carefully moulded upon the parabola, hyperbola, or ellipse. Mr. Russell gave diagrams, showing the practical application of some of those rules to works of art. His explanation was very clear and intelligible, and went far to bear out the doctrine he was desirous of enforcing. Other gentlemen spoke on the same subject, all agreeing that the science of geometry was much more extensively applied by the Greeks to art and architecture than by the moderns. A gentleman, however, who possessed great practical experience, gave it as his opinion that very few artists were made use of the mathematics to the extent inferred. A finished taste and practised eye did all that was required.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM, CLAPTON.—On Monday, the Half-yearly General Meeting of the Governors of this Institution, established for the reception of destitute Orphans from all parts of the kingdom, but principally those descended from respectable parents, was held at the London Tavern, to receive the Annual Report, to appoint officers for the year ensuing, and to elect from an unusually lengthened list of candidates, ten girls and twenty boys, to be received into the establishment. James Capel, Esq., who presided, having opened the proceedings with a few pertinent observations, the Rev. C. Mackenzie, M.A., Rector of St. Benedict, Gracechurch-street, read the Report. It stated that, on the present occasion, there were 168 fatherless children imploring the sympathy of the subscribers; but that, in consequence of the heavy demands on the funds of the Institution during the past year, arising from the increased price of provisions, and the necessary repair of the building at Clapton, they could not admit, at the present election, more than 30 children; still they indulged the hope that, at the election in May next, a larger number might be received. In order to meet the increased expenditure, the Directors had found it necessary to sell out £2000 of stock. There were at present 230 children under the protection of the Asylum, making the total number of children received within its walls since its establishment, 1665. Amongst the benefactors to the Institution during the last half-year were:—"A Friend," £1000; J. Dean Paul, Esq., £50; Mrs. Lonsa Pell, £20; and H. Miller, Esq., £19 19s. The financial statement showed that the receipts had been £10,020, while the expenditure (including the sale of £2000 worth of stock, and £1800 for repairs) slightly exceeded that sum. The Report was adopted.

EARLY CLOSING. A large meeting of the assistant drapers, and young men in the employ of the tradesmen generally in the neighborhood of Chelsea, Pimlico, and the adjacent districts, was held on Tuesday night, at the Commercial Rooms, in the King's-road, for the purpose of forwarding the desirable object of relinquishing all business at seven o'clock in the evening. The chair was taken by Mr. S. C. Hall. A scheme somewhat similar to that pursued by the Anti-Corn-law League was submitted to the meeting by the Secretary of the Early Closing Association, viz.—to leave a copy of the "Price Essay" on the Eyes produced by the Late Hours of Business" with every respectable householder in London, and afterwards waiting on them to obtain their signatures to a pledge that neither they nor their servants should purchase any article after the hour above mentioned. A resolution to carry into effect the objects of this Association was proposed by A. Leggatt, Esq., surgeon, who pointed out the physical evils attending the present system of fourteen and sixteen hours' daily labour behind a counter. It was seconded by F. Lloyd, Esq., and carried unanimously. Similar meetings are to be held in various parts of the metropolis for the same purpose.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—The following Judges were, on Tuesday, arranged with regard to the above circuit. Before Mr. Baron Alderson and Mr. Baron Rolfe:—Lancaster—Saturday, Feb. 19; Appleby—Wednesday, Feb. 23; Carlisle—Friday, Feb. 25; Newcastle—Tuesday, Feb. 29, Durham—Saturday, March 4; York—Thursday, March 9; Liverpool—Monday, March 20

In consequence of the new postal arrangements with France, the committee of the Stock Exchange have decided on having the closing prices of the French funds on the Paris Bourse posted in the Stock Exchange every morning at ten o'clock, and on Tuesday the alteration was carried into effect for the first time. The change has given general satisfaction.

THE GOVERNMENT SURVEY OF LONDON. A party of sappers and miners, from Woolwich, on Friday (last week) commenced the erection of the scaffolding, at the north-west tower of Westminster Abbey, from which the intended Government survey of London is to be taken. The place is said to have been chosen as affording the best view of the western part of the metropolis in connection with the great plan of sanitary improvement, which, under the new Commissioners, is intended to be carried out, the Government supplying the plan.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL. On Wednesday, Mr James Dixon, one of the surgeons of the London Ophthalmic Hospital, was appointed assistant surgeon to the hospital, in the place of Mr B Travers, jun., resigned.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Registrar-General's report for the week ending Saturday, the 22nd instant, shows that a rate of mortality which considerably exceeds the average continues to prevail. The deaths registered in the metropolitan districts were 1401; the winter average, 1107: the excess, therefore, is 294. The total number gives a decrease on that of the previous week, which was 1467. Influenza continues to decline; instead of 374, enumerated under this specific disease seven weeks ago (when, as has been formerly stated, the mortality from all other maladies was exceedingly aggravated by the same cause), the deaths in last week were only 80. It is worthy of remark that during the last nine weeks the deaths in each return have exceeded the deaths of the same return, with the exception of a single week; and, in the whole period, the deaths are in a majority of 3661, a disquieting process which, it is probable, already involves the loss of considerably more than a third of the natural increase of the year. Among the deaths from external causes in the previous week is that of a child, who died in the sub-district of Bow from "fits caused by disease augmented by pecuniary distress from hot drudging," according to the Coroner's verdict.

SOME KITCHENS FOR THE POOR.—It is very gratifying to state that these very useful asylums are being opened to the poor in different parts of the metropolis. The benevolent who send their contributions to such institutions would, indeed, be gratified to witness the eagerness with which the poor starving creatures approach their humble, but to them salutary, and life-sustaining meal. At the soup kitchen of the Poor Man's Guardian Society, upwards of 810 persons were, on Tuesday, relieved with soup and bread, this being the average number daily.

PROSECUTIONS. The several police courts in the metropolis have received the following directions on the subject of prosecutions for all serious offences within their respective districts:—"Whitehall, 26th December, 1847. Sir,—Some instances having recently occurred of prisoners charged with serious offences being committed for trial, and of public inconvenience experienced from want of directions to Counsel to prosecute, I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to desire that for the future, in all serious cases of committals, when the parties are not bound over, or is unable to prosecute, you will transmit as early as possible, for the information of the Secretary of State, copies of the depositions taken by you therein, that the same may be considered, and directions given for prosecutions. I am, &c., S. M. PHILLIPPS."

HONESTY REWARDED.—A few days since, as a poor man, named Ward, in the employ of Mr. Thomas Wembley, the contractor, was filling a mud-cart near the Greenwich school, Greenwich, he observed a dirty piece of paper, and on taking it up he found it to be a £50 note. He took it to Mr. S. Noble, who advised him to keep it until he heard of an owner. He did so, but ultimately went to the Greenwich Bank, and the name of Bennett, soap manufacturer, was discovered on the back of the note. This gentleman was written to, and claimed the note. As a recompense for honesty, Mr. Bennett ordered Ward, the finder of the note, to be paid, through the Nelson-street Bank, Greenwich, the sum of 2s. 6d. per week for life.

THE WEATHER.—The guards who arrived at the General Post-office by the different railway mail trains on Wednesday stated that many parts of the country, especially in the north, are covered several feet deep with snow, and the waters completely frozen over several inches thick; so that in all probability canal communication, should the present frost continue a few days, will be effectually stopped. In the eastern, western, and midland counties the fall of snow has been very heavy; also in Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, and parts of Surrey. Numerous carts-loads of ice from the environs of the metropolis have been sold, and the ice-houses of the confectioners and fishmongers. The Serpentine in Hyde-park, the piece of water in St. James's-park and Regent's-park denoted the probability of soon affording an amusement to skaters.

APPOINTMENTS. Mr. William Law, one of the clerks in the Treasury, has been appointed to act as private secretary to Lord John Russell, in the absence from England of Mr. Charles Grey. The appointment will be confirmed by the election to the House of Commons of both his Lordship's secretaries, Mr. R. W. Grey and the Hon. Colonel Keppel. Mr Henry Edward Stanley is appointed Assistant Precis Writer to the Foreign Office—an arrangement rendered necessary by the Precis Writer, Lord Arden, having a seat in Parliament. Mr. Arthur Bailey is appointed Surveyor-General at the Falkland Isles. Mr. John Scott is to be Surveyor-General to the new settlement of Labuan. The new Consul, Mr. Plowden who is appointed for the purpose of extending our relations with Abyssinia—will reside at Massoah, a port on the Red Sea, dependent on the Ottoman empire. We believe that the vacant Garter will be conferred on the Duke of Norfolk.

NAVAL STORES.—Messrs. Carlisle, Capel, and Co having purchased 50,000lb. weight of tea, in bond, for the naval department, the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury have issued the necessary directions to the revenue authorities for the same to be removed from the bonded warehouses in Fenchurch-street and Cratched-friars respectively, and delivered into her Majesty's victualling stores at Deptford dockyard free of duty.

THE COLLEGIATE CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

PORTION OF ROOD SCREEN

THE OLD Collegiate Church of Manchester, now elevated to the rank of a Cathedral Church, is one of the most beautiful specimens of the late period of Gothic Architecture in England, and we have, therefore, given a general view of the exterior, and a representation of the exquisitely decorated Choir.

The Cathedral is a noble building in its proportions, its great length and the loftiness of its massive tower, arresting and commanding admiration; whilst its richly traceried windows and elegantly wrought and pierced battlements, by their delicacy and variety of design, add to the richness and effect of the whole, which is enhanced by the lights and shadows produced by the projecting buildings of the Chapter-house, a cumbrous monument to the Hulmes, and a Chantry or Chapel belonging to the Derby family. The general appearance of the exterior is very time-worn, the soft new red sandstone of which the Cathedral is built having suffered much from the eroding power of the proverbially moist atmosphere of Manchester; the delicate tracery and mouldings being sadly mutilated, whilst the thick smoke from the numerous factories in the town has lent its aid in still further disfiguring the building, by an all pervading dingy tint.

The wretched taste in Gothic architecture which prevailed some years since, in its attempted restorations and improvements, has lent its aid to the factory smoke in diminishing the attractions of the Cathedral, as the miserable details of the pinnacles over the clock, and similar abominations, testify.

Our View of Manchester Cathedral is taken from the south, and shows the general character of the building. The elaborate traceries of the windows, varied in the several portions of the Church, in the Clerestories, Nave and Choir, Aisles, Chapter House, and Lady Chapel; and the exquisite character of the open work parapet has been carefully detailed.

The noble and beautifully-traceried belfry windows to the Tower are worthy of the building; and the panelled work in the Tower and its battlements is of fine design and execution.

The plain ugly building with enriched battlements, near the octangular Chapter House, is the Monument to the Hulme Family before referred to, and is no addition to the architectural character of the whole; and the turret between the Nave and Choir is of too plain a design to harmonise completely with the elaborate tracery in windows, spandrils, and parapet, which it severs by its unbroken and simple form. The buttresses, angular in plan in the upper stories, are all highly enriched with trefoil-headed panelling on their faces, and are terminated by pinnacles; those to the Nave aisles of plain form; and to the Nave and Choir, of somewhat uncharacteristic form, besides being very stumpy.

The general effect of the interior of the Cathedral is extremely beautiful. Its great length, and the elegance of its windows, arches, and ceilings, combine to produce a most harmonious whole. On entering the NAVE, the visitor is at once struck by the glare of light which seems to fill the place; for the clerestories being nearly all window, as the piers between each window are extremely narrow, the daylight streams into the building in all its effulgence, scarcely shaded by the rich tracery of the windows. The ceiling of the Nave is gabled, and is supported by beams elegantly wrought with tracery, resting on richly-foliated spandrils, which rise from corbels carved as angels. The spaces between the main beams are each divided into sixteen compartments by lesser beams, having rich bosses at their intersections. The bosses are enriched with colour, and the whole has recently been renovated.

The ceilings of the aisles are panelled in similar style to that of the Nave, and also decorated with exquisitely-carved bosses.

The spandrils of the arches separating the Nave from the aisles are filled with highly-ornamented quatrefoils and tracery, and a bratishing of Tudor-flower character runs along under the clerestory windows. The Nave is separated from the Choir by a rood screen, an interesting example, and of a portion of which we give a representation in our initial letter. The arches are beautifully carved, and enriched with foliated adornments in the spandrils. The screen has lately undergone a cleansing and scraping; and this text from Deuteronomy, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," was found carved upon it, concealed by paint.

The CHOIR is truly beautiful in its character and details, and, as may be seen by our representation, full of architectural enrichments. The roof is divided into compartments by beams supported by cusped semi-arches, which have their spandrils filled with circles containing elaborately-pierced and foliated tracery; and the larger compartments are subdivided into others, each filled with highly wrought tracery, in lesser or more rich variety, intricacy, and beauty of design, add their peculiar enrichments to the sculptural decorations of the whole, and form a specimen of timber-work of surpassing interest.

The great east window is a noble specimen of the Perpendicular style, and has some stained glass in it, and, by the way, very little stained glass remains in the different windows to give their tints to the glorious architecture. At the altar, a large piece of faded tapestry, in carved wood frame, serves as the altar screen.

The stalls, the pride and glory of this Church, are of the richest possible design and most marvellous delicacy of execution. Indeed, in lightness, yet intricacy of design, their canopies and tabernacle work resemble filagree more than sculptured wood, so thin, so intertwined, so closely involuted do all the parts appear. They are nearly black, and are in great need of careful cleaning.

THE CHOIR.

The carvings to the seats are of the most picturesque character; and, in many instances of most irreverent and ludicrous subjects, and show infinitely more skill in selecting the grotesque, than in realising those impassioned subjects which should mark the House of God. A recent writer has observed with great descriptive powers, that in the Choir of this Church "The sculptor seems to have let his imagination altogether run riot. In one compartment, there sits, with a birch over his shoulder, an old fox, stern of aspect as Goldsmith's schoolmaster, engaged in teaching two cubs to read. In another, a respectable-looking boar, elevated on his hind legs, is playing on the bagpipe, while his hopeful family, four young pigs, are dancing to his music behind their trough. In yet another there is a hare, contemplating with evident satisfaction a boiling pot, which contains a dog in a fair way of becoming tender. But in yet another the priestly designer seems to have lost sight of prudence and decorum altogether; the chief figure in the piece is a monkey administering extreme unction to a dying man, while a party of other monkeys are plundering the poor sufferer of his effects, and gobbling up his provisions. A Scotch Highlander's faith in the fairies is much less a reality now than it has been; but few Scotch Highlanders would venture to take such liberties with their neighbours, the 'good people,' as the old ecclesiastics of Manchester took with the servants of their religion."

The spandrils of the arches supporting the clerestory, are filled in the same way as those in the Nave, and a similar pattern, of the Tudor flower, forms a brattishing above the arches.

The Organ is at the West-end of the Choir, but it will probably be removed, and a fresh one, more in accordance with the architectural features of the Cathedral substituted.

The Pulpit at present in use is a very inappropriate, but we anticipate a new one is in progress.

A Font will also soon be made, a lady having given the sum of fifty pounds towards erecting one, for, at present, there is no Font in the Cathedral.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

On Sunday morning, the 23rd inst., the Rev. James Prince Lee, D.D., was consecrated Bishop of Manchester, by the Archbishop of York. This office was performed in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, which was crowded by a very large and respectable congregation.

At eleven o'clock, the Bishop's procession entered the Chapel, comprising Dr. Burnaby, Vice-General of the Archbishop of Canterbury; Mr. F. H. Dyke, Principal Registrar of the province of Canterbury; Dr. Addams and Mr. Townsend, the Advocate and Proctor for the Dean and Chapter of Manchester, and for the new Bishop; the Bishop of Manchester, accompanied by the Rev. John Garbett, Rural Dean of Birmingham, and Honorary Canon of Worcester; the Bishop of Chester, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Archbishop of York, accompanied by the Chaplains, and by his Secretary, Mr. J. Barker, of Parker-street, who is also Secretary to the Bishop of Manchester. The Archbishop and Bishops proceeded to the Communion-table, and the rest of the party were accommodated with seats near it.

THE RIGHT REV. JAMES PRINCE LEE, BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

Morning prayer being ended, the Archbishop began the Communion Service. The Bishop of Worcester read "for the Epistle" the appointed portion of Acts xx.; and the Bishop of Chester read the Gospel. Then the Nicene Creed having been said, the Rev. J. Garbett ascended the pulpit and preached the sermon, taking for his text Acts ii. 47,—"The Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved."

At the conclusion of the sermon, the elected Bishop, vested with his rochet, was presented to the Archbishop by the Bishops of Chester and Worcester, the Archbishop sitting in his chair near the holy table. The Most Rev. Prelate demanded the Queen's mandate for the consecration, and Mr. Watts, from the Vicar-General's office, produced, and Mr. Dyke read, her Majesty's letters patent, commanding his Grace to consecrate Dr. Lee, who had been chosen by the Dean and Chapter of Manchester to be their Bishop and Pastor, and of whose election her Majesty had accepted. Dr. Lee then took the oath of allegiance, the oath of the Queen's supremacy, and against the ecclesiastical or spiritual jurisdiction within this realm of any foreign Prince or Prelate; and also the oath "professing and promising all due reverence and obedience to the Archbishop."

The Consecration then proceeded according to the form in the Prayer-book. The examination by the Archbishop in the manner there set down being concluded, the Bishop-elect retired to the Vestry to put on the rest of the Episcopal habit, and then returning, and kneeling before the Communion-Table, the hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus" was said over him; and afterwards the Archbishop and the two Bishops laid their hands upon his head, the Archbishop saying—"Receive the Holy Ghost, for the office and work of a Bishop in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. And remember that thou stir up the grace of God, which is given thee by this imposition of our hands; for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and love, and soberness." The Bible was then presented by the Archbishop, with the exhortation appointed to be delivered; and, thereupon, the benediction was pronounced, and the congregation were dismissed, the Prelates and some others remaining to partake of the Communion.

The singing was by the choir belonging to the Chapel, Messrs. Allen, Payne, &c. The chants were by Dr. Cooke and Dr. Battishall. Mr. Massey presided at the organ.

It was understood that Mr. Gutteridge went into the Vestry before the service began, and handed to the Archbishop a protest against the consecration of Dr. Lee. It was said that his Grace immediately put the document in the fire.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Our Artist was present during the Consecration, and sketched the impressive ceremony at the altar; as well as a Portrait of the Bishop of Manchester. His Lordship was, it will be recollected, Head Master of the Grammar School at Birmingham; and, we find in the Manchester Guardian the following characteristics of the new Bishop, by a Correspondent of that Journal:—

"I do not expect he will excel as a preacher so much as a reformer of abuses, and an originator of new means of usefulness. As far as I have enjoyed opportunities of judging, he has considerable tact in selecting the most suitable minds for any particular work, and is very successful in aiding and encouraging those about him under any trial or arduous task. He is remarkably kind and conciliatory. During the periodical admission of new scholars at Easter, the parents or guardians of the children bring them for examination previous to their reception in the school. On one occasion when I was present, Mr. Lee tried the child's ability to read the New Testament, this being an indispensable qualification to enter the school. Many a child's heart sank within it when this test came to be tried; but it was sure to be cheered and encouraged, just in the most likely way to raise its spirits. In no case did I see the slightest hurry or impatience during the tedious process; and I was told by several persons that Mr. Leenever delegated this task to any one, but examined every child that entered the school himself. Such a working pastor Manchester has long wanted: let the Church and the world see how his labours will be accepted and blessed."

The Bishop of Exeter is causing some excitement among the Clergy in his diocese, by a new rule he has laid down, of subjecting every one to a re-examination who may apply to be instituted to a benefice, or licensed to a curacy, no matter how long the party may have been in holy orders.

The Lord Bishop of Cape Town. The Persia Indiaman, having on board the Bishop of Cape Town, arrived safely at Madeira on the 30th ult., after a fine passage of ten days from Portsmouth. His Lordship, on New Year's Day, held a Confirmation in the English Church, in the presence of her Majesty Queen Adelaide, when several young persons were admitted to that holy rite of the Church; and, in the evening, the Bishop and Mrs. Gray had the honour to dine with her Majesty. His Lordship, with the clergymen and catechists who accompany him to his diocese, were most kindly entertained and lodged during their stay at Madeira, in the residences of the principal merchants. On the 4th instant they sailed from the island, and will touch at St. Helena, where it is expected the Bishop will again be called on to exercise his sacred functions in administering the rite of Confirmation to the young members of the Church resident on that island.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

IF the dread of "French aggression," so generally encouraged by the "British press," were submitted for definition to that "council of four" who have recently published a little book, where amid much that is merely smart, there are some things smart and true also, one of the replies would probably be that it is "a device to terrify a people into heavier taxation." In mechanics, the power must always be greater than the resistance to be overcome; and as there is nothing an Englishman dislikes so much as parting with his money to that myth—a Government—it follows if more is wanted, or thought to be wanted, that no must be forced, or wheedled, or frightened out of it. Force will not exactly do; coaxing is left on a nearly race that wants all the cash it has got, and would rather get more than give away any; terror only is left, and so we have daily visions of a French corps d'armée advancing on London by the Brighton road, with the companion picture of the Guards walking out of the city by the opposite way, as "the wisest thing they could do." The effect is immense; the very smallest result will be five per cent. more on the Income Tax; and when that is safely voted, we shall hear no more for three years to come of a French invasion.

It is an old weapon furbished up for modern use; the Stuarts never could squeeze their aids and subsidies out of the people, save under the operation of a good national alarm; the Pope and "the Spaniard" were then the bugbears; it was not till a later date the "French King" was worth employing as the scarecrow—the traditions of the times of the Henrys and Edwards had not died out. But this branch of la haute politique became better understood towards the end of the last, and the beginning of the present century. Has it ever been calculated how many millions sterling England was frightened out of by the French Revolution? But we were destined to see days of greater terror than those: Napoleon little thought what aid he lent to Pitt's Chancellor of the Exchequer when he gathered an army on the heights of Boulogne, and threatened to invade us in flat-bottomed boats. The "alarm" was, to a great extent, real, but, politically, the Government made the most of it; the people submitted cheerfully to an amount of taxation that no previous Minister had dared contemplate; the French army was sent to be slaughtered on other fields than those of Albion, the alarm passed away, but the taxation did not, and for many a year the Ministry, as it counted its millions, had reason to thank Napoleon for giving the English nation one of the greatest frights it had ever experienced.

The present paroxysm is a faint image of the terror of that time; and evident preparations are making to turn it to a similar account. The letter of the Duke of Wellington, and all the commentaries upon it, all the of which we have lately seen so much, have this financial tendency. Indeed it might be established as a maxim of Government in England, when taxation is reaching its limit, produce your "natural enemy," play him dexterously, and when the public is excited to the proper pitch, the Chancellor of the Exchequer can venture to produce a Budget with a new tax in it, "feeling convinced," as he will say in the peroration of his financial statement, "that the patriotic spirit of Englishmen will make them submit cheerfully to the sacrifice." All that we have described here has been done, and will be done again.

It is a curious fact, that while this agitation is going on here, in France there is a similar apprehension that we and some one else will invade her territory, bombard Paris, and do the fortifying their sea ports, which last, within living memory, have heard English cannon balls whistling through their streets. Struck by this circumstance, we have tried to ascertain what is the tone of mind among the French with respect to foreign invasion. We find it is eminently practical and self relying, and, strange to say, the best writer on the subject, contemplating a second incursion of the forces of the Holy Alliance, recommends the nation not to trust too much to the army! This is the opinion of Paul Louis Courier, himself a soldier who had seen many campaigns, and knew the nature of military operations as well as sixteen years' service can teach it. Arm the people and declare war to the knife, and then see how badly an invading army will come out of the struggle. such is the declaration to be drawn from a passage we are about to quote. It is not quite without confirmation from the military history of the last war. Napoleon found Spain a difficult conquest; he was opposed by ill-organised troops and the peasantry who had never seen a day's drill; there one French army surrendered, and the Emperor's brother was driven to ignominious flight. Prussia had an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, trained in all the discipline of the great Frederick, and supposed to be the most perfect force, the model army, of Europe. Little more than ten days sufficed to Napoleon to shatter it to pieces, seize the capital, and bring all Germany to his feet; afterwards, when the national spirit of Germany was appealed to, and peasants, students, and traders took arms, with little or no discipline at all, the French were driven again across the Rhine. The inference is that, for defence, an army is not always so strong nor a people so weak as it is generally supposed. In fact, all would not be lost even if a French army did land, provided we adopted the French writer's mode of meeting it; he addressed the combination of the Holy Alliance, which, at one period of the Restoration, took a threatening position towards France. The passage only requires "the Emperor" to be changed into "the Duke," and Sussex and Kent to be substituted for Alsace and Lorraine, after the fashion of La Fleur's love-letter, and we may derive from it a lesson not without encouragement in these days of insane apprehension of well nigh impossible perils. there is classic authority for being "taught by the enemy:" "As I can no longer rely for protection on the genius of the Emperor and the valour of his Invincible Guard, the people will adopt the expedient of defending themselves, a fatal resolution, which, as you well know, confounds all tactics, renders war 'on scientific principles' impossible, and disconcerts the most elaborately calculated plans of attack. If you are prudent, then, remember the advice I am about to give you. As you march through Lorraine and Alsace, keep at a respectful distance from the hedges; come not near the ditches; hold aloof from the woods and vineyards; beware of copses, trees, and shrubs, and look with suspicion at high grass and corn; don't come too near the farms and villages; above all, never venture to march through a village—make a circuit round it, and that with precaution. For hedges, ditches, vineyards, copses, bushes, will open a fire on you on every side not exactly by files or platoons perhaps, but a fire well directed, and bearing slaughter along with it. Wherever you turn you will not find a hut or shed but will be a garrison against you. Send us no flags of truce, we'll keep them prisoners; send out no detachments from your main body, we'll cut them to pieces. Bring your provisions with you, corn and cattle, under strong escorts too, as well as your waggons; bread, meat, forage, furnish yourselves with all, for on our soil you shall find nothing as you pass, if ever you pass at all. If you ever sleep on it, it shall lie on the earth, for though we cannot remove our houses we know it will be better to rebuild than to relay them—it is sooner done and costs less. Do not be surprised if, in this style of fighting, you meet with a few inconveniences; there is really small pleasure in conquering a people that will not be conquered. In such a gentlemanly profession as that of arms, there is nothing disgusts one so soon as having to contend with the lower classes, the common people! And if you retreat, if you are compelled to return without having made peace or stipulated for indemnity, then, then, I warn you, few of you shall live to tell your children what France is when every man seizes a musket, and fights, without having for leaders either heroes—or gentlemen!"

THE WEATHER.

THE sky, during the whole of the week, except during the evenings of Sunday and Wednesday, and part of the morning of Monday, has been covered by cloud. The air has passed from the N.E. or N.N.E. The amount of water mixed with the air has been very small, and, consequently, the air has been in a dry state. The temperature has been below the average for the season during the whole week. The following are some particulars of each day.

Thursday, Jan. 20, the sky was covered by cirro-stratus throughout the day, some sleet fell during the morning; the direction of the wind was N., and the average temperature for the day was 36½°. Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; some snow was falling during the morning; the direction of the wind was N.E., and the average temperature of the day was 31°. Saturday, the sky was overcast all day; a thin misty rain fell in the evening; the direction of the wind was N.N.E., and the average temperature was 31°. Sunday, the sky was overcast till the evening, which was cloudless; the direction of the wind was N.N.E., and the average temperature for the day was 31°. Monday, the extreme dryness of the air, together with its quick motion, caused the day to be very painful; the average temperature of the air was 34½°; a little sleet fell at about 9h. A.M. The average temperature of the air for the week ending this day was 36½°, being about 7° below that of the season.

|---|---|---|---|
| Thursday, | Jan. 20, the highest during the day was 34½ deg., and the lowest was 29 2 deg. | | |
| Friday, | Jan. 21, ..... | 38 | ..... 30 |
| Saturday | Jan. ... | 4[illegible] | 30 |
| Sunday | Jan. ... | 3[illegible] | 29? |
| Monday, | Jan. ... | 36½ | 31 |
| Tuesday, | Jan. ... | 3[illegible] | 28 |
| Wednesday, | Jan. 26, ..... | 29 | 23½ |

It will be seen from these numbers that there has scarcely been any difference in the degree during the day and night, and, with the exception of Monday, the thermometer reading has been principally below the freezing point of water

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Saturday, the Queen and Prince Albert walk in the Castle pleasure-grounds both in the morning and afternoon, weather permitting, and the junior members of the Royal Family take their usual daily airings. The Earl and Countess Cowper and the Earl of Liverpool left the Castle yesterday. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen on Saturday at the Castle, and partook of luncheon with her Majesty and her Royal Consort.

On Sunday, her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service during the morning in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent also attended the service.

On Sunday afternoon Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting in the mausoleum. His Royal Highness was attended by Sir Edward Bowater, General Wemyss, General Bowles, and Colonel Bouverie. Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, attended by the Lady in Waiting to the Queen, the Gentleman in Waiting on the King, his Excellency M. WEDNESDAY.—Lord John Russell arrived at the Castle to-day, from Richmond-park, accompanied by his Lady. The Viscountess Palmerston also joined the Royal party at the Castle to-day. The former arrived at the Castle on a visit to Lord Spencer, the Lord Steward, was also among the arrivals to-day. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort had proposed a shooting party in the forest for to-day, but, in consequence of the heavy rain which fell during the morn was postponed. The King and Queen of the Belgians went in one of the Royal carriages to Frogmore again to-day, to visit her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Their Majesties returned to the Castle within an hour. The Earl of Morton, who went out of waiting on Tuesday (as Lord in Waiting on her Majesty), was succeeded by Lord Alfred Paget. Mr. Grimsby Gore at the same time succeeded Mr. Dixon, Captain Gordon as Groom in Waiting. Lord George Lennox, in waiting on his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, also left the Castle to-day, for the Cowley Barracks, in this garrison. The Royal dinner party at the Castle this evening included their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Countess de Vaux, the Lady in Waiting to the Queen of the Belgians, La Marquise de Trazegnies, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Speth, Earl Spencer, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lord and Lady John Russell, Mr. G. E. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, and Major de Moerkerke.

ARRIVAL OF THE KING AND QUEEN OF THE BELGIANS.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians reached London on Monday afternoon by special train of the South-Eastern Railway from Dover. Her Majesty's steamer Black Eagle conveyed their Majesties from Dover harbour shortly after two o'clock in the afternoon. Their Majesties landed under a Royal salute, and with their suite immediately proceeded to the railway station. The troops from the garrison, with the usual guards, were drawn up in order, as usual on such occasions. The Earl of Morton, Lord George Lennox, his Excellency M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Minister, Commander Smithett, and other officers, were in the train of their Majesties on the railway. The King and Queen were received at the station by Mr. James Macgregor, Chairman of the Company; Mr. E. L. Pritchard, Deputy-Chairman; the Hon. James Byng, a Director; and Mr. James Walter, Superintendent of the line

It being their Majesties' wish to reach Windsor Castle at an early hour, the train at once proceeded, and although there had been a fall of snow throughout the line, yet the distance from Dover to London, 88 miles, was run in one hour and half minutes. The engine was driven by Mr W. Fenthrough, assistant locomotive superintendent

On arriving at the Bricklayers' Arms station, their Majesties warmly expressed their satisfaction, the King loudly observing to Mr Macgregor that it was the quickest journey he had ever experienced.

The Royal party left the station in three carriages-and-four; four of their Majesties' private carriages afterwards came up from Dover by a second special train.

THE COURT will remove to Buckingham Palace, for the season, on the 2nd of February

THE QUEEN DOWAGER. From Madeira we learn that Queen Adelaide continues in the enjoyment of excellent health, a decided improvement is perceptible in the condition of her Majesty since her arrival at that salubrious island. The services of the Royal physician, Sir David Davies, who is staying with the Royal household, have not been called into requisition throughout the period which has elapsed since the Dowager Queen left England

THE ROYAL BOUNTY.—Mrs. Glasscock, widow of Captain Glasscock, R.N., whose death was hastened by his devotion to the public service, and the harassing duties in which he was engaged, has received £100 from the last distribution of the Royal Bounty. The Misses Wade, sisters of Lieutenant Charles Francis Wade, R.N., of her Majesty's ship Dido, who was killed in action will the pirates of Borneo, August, 14, 1844, have also been presented with £100 by her Majesty's orders, from the same grant. Those who have read the graphic description of the adventures in the Indian Archipelago against the pirates of those regions, as given in the narrative of the Hon Henry Keppel, the commander of the Dido, will appreciate the grand but melancholy circumstances of Lieutenant Wade's death. He fell at Captain Keppel's feet, mortally wounded by two shots from the pirates of whom they were in pursuit, at the time being in advance of the men composing the detachments. It was an affecting incident in the funeral of poor Wade, that his companions feared to trust his body for interment on the land. His remains were, consequently, lowered into the river, and the burial service was read by his friend and commander from his own prayer-book, which he had brought with him, as he said, "for fear of accidents"

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THE QUEEN ON THE PROSECUTION OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY v. SIR WILLIAM YOUNG AND CHARRITTE. SALE OF A CADETSHIP.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, on Friday (yesterday), moved for the judgment of the Court upon Captain Charrette in this case, the facts of which were given in our report of the trial a few weeks ago, the continued indisposition of Sir William Young precluding the possibility of calling him up at present.

Mr. Cockburn, Q.C., on the part of Sir W. Young, applied for a new trial in this case.

Mr. Crowder appeared on behalf of Captain Charrette for the same purpose

ANCIENT REMAINS FOUND.—Some very interesting Roman remains were on Wednesday discovered in excavating for the foundation of the new Coal Exchange. They consist of a large floor of tessellated pavement, and the remains of a Hypocaust, the bottom floor of which is astonishingly perfect. ### FOREIGN NEWS.

SWITZERLAND.

A note from AUSTRIA, conceived in the same sense as that of the French Cabinet, was communicated on the 22nd to the Swiss Diet. It was decided that these two notes should be referred to the examination of a Committee, which is to report its opinion of them. Several deputies expressed themselves on this occasion with a certain warmth on the pretension of the two Cabinets to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland, and stated on the occasion to protest against the assertions made in the tribune of the Chamber of Peers by Count de Montalembert. The Assembly, with the exception of Neufchatel, voted unanimously the address to the army. This address, said the county of Fribarg, will serve to refute the calumnious statements made in foreign countries. The assembly was also to have occupied itself with the proposition of Berne, relative to the amnesty; but the report not being ready, the affair was postponed to the next day.

DENMARK.

An official confirmation of the death of the King was received on Friday (yesterday) at the Danish Embassy in London.

MANCHESTER CATHEDRAL.—A lady has lately forwarded to the Very Reverend the Dean of Manchester the sum of £200, for the purpose of presenting such any article of furniture or ornament which might be thought advisable or necessary. The Dean, after consultation with the churchwardens, has decided that it is appropriate the money should be given to aid, instead of the proposed marble tiling at present used for that purpose.

COUNTRY NEWS.

A MEETING of the depositors in the Liverpool Banking Company was held on Wednesday at Liverpool, for the purpose of determining on the best course to be adopted in order to obtain payment of their demands. It was stated at the meeting that repeated applications had been made at the Bank for a settlement, but that nothing satisfactory was elicited until the present meeting. It had been advertised, when the Manager intimated that the Bank would pay its deposits by promissory notes, one-third on the 1st of April, one-third on the 1st of August, and one-third on the 1st of December, 1848; and the interest due on the deposits on the 1st of February, 1849. To these terms the majority of the creditors appeared willing to accede, but ultimately it was determined that a committee should be appointed to wait upon the Directors of the Bank and learn whether better terms could not be obtained from them.

MURDER NEAR BRISTOL.—On Friday (last week), an inquest was held at the [illegible] painters' Arms, Dundry, about four miles from Bristol, before Mr. R. Uphill, Coroner, touching the murder of a respectable yeoman named Walsing Hazell. The deceased, an old man, sixty-four years of age, was a [illegible] in Dundry. A maiden sister lived with him, as did also two nephews, young men, named James and Benjamin Hazell. On Monday afternoon last [illegible] were at work in a barn, talking with his nephews. After that hour nothing was seen of him; and as he did not reach home in the evening, the greatest alarm was occasioned to his sister, as he was a man of remarkably steady habits. A search was instituted, but without effect; and among other places searched was a stable, the key of which James Hazell at first refused to give up, saying that he could not be there; and in the kit was found by his brother Benjamin, who also said that the stable should not be opened. A short time afterwards, however, the stable was opened, but the search there proved of no avail. On Thursday, in consequence of an alleged dream on the subject by two men, an [illegible] were again searched, and in it was found the dead body of deceased. There were marks over the eye of a tremendous blow, and also upon the back of the hand were several marks of heavy blows. In the pockets of the deceased were twopence in silver, and a few articles of trifling value. The body was then removed to the house. A man named John Hill assisted to remove the body into the house, and he then went to a dunghill near the stable, turned it over with a fork, and found an oak stick two and a half inches thick, and about two feet long; on this stick were marks of blood, and there were also [illegible] Hill was examined by [illegible] and discovering that the deceased had with him at the time he was missed, on a wall adjoining the stable. The two nephews were taken into custody upon suspicion of committing the murder, and were attended by Mr. Harrar, solicitor, Bristol. Hall was severely cross-examined by Mr. Harrar, and he gave most evasive answers. At first he said he was at a public house from twelve to eight o'clock on Monday, and afterwards admitted that he was absent from the house for some time. He also was, after the inquiry, taken into custody upon a charge of being an accessory. The inquest was adjourned.

PLOUGH-DAY FAIR. This fair took place last week, when a great many inferior horses were in the market, and sold well; good horses being very scarce were of course highly high. On Friday there was a large supply of store cattle, and a good attend ance of buyers, which were also in consequence of the variety of the stock, that it is impossible to give the average.—Northampton Journal

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA. The Prussian Times and Gazette contains the following, under date St. Petersburgh, Jan 11:—"According to the last accounts received from Moscow, one man died on the 19th of December; cholera cases occurred in that city from the 19th to the 26th of December, eighty four of which terminated fatally. During the preceding three weeks the epidemic preserved the same degree of intensity; but, during several days, the number of cases had been somewhat more considerable. In the districts of the Government of Moscow the scourge was of a mild character. In the Government of Twer it continued circumscribed within the limits of the district of Torschok; but in the [illegible] communes of Kasan and Orenburgh it raged with more violence. In those of Mensk and Podolsk it was extending slowly. The town of Bobruisk had severely suffered. On the 14th of December the cholera manifested itself at Witepsk."

MURDER AT LEEDS BARRACKS.

On Saturday last an inquest was held on the body of Margaret Garrard, a soldier's wife, who was shot by a private in the 97th Regiment, now lying at the Leeds Barracks, on Thursday night, last week.

The prisoner, Michael Stokes, twenty years of age, is a slender young man, and somewhat boyish in appearance. The expression of his countenance was rather serious than otherwise, and he seemed to pay great attention to the proceedings.

Surgical evidence of the nature and effects of the wound having been given,

William Keenan, sergeant in the 97th Regiment of Foot, stated: The prisoner Stokes has been in the regiment about two years. I was in the room as the deceased's husband. The prisoner was in the room as the time. He was [illegible] a part of the time on a form near the fireplace. He had his eyes shut, but he [illegible] sleep, as I saw him open one of his eyes and look at me. I do not think he was asleep during the time. About a quarter before seven o'clock I saw him go into the armoury in the same room, and soon after that I saw the musket in his hands. He appeared in the act of cleaning it. I afterwards saw him [illegible] towards his shoulder. I was about two yards from him. I towards the deceased, and fired at off. It was done very quickly, but I am sure it was done deliberately, and that it was not an accident. The muzzle was pointed at the centre of the deceased's body. Instantly after the prisoner had fired he threw the musket at my feet, and said, "There, now, that will do; I am satisfied." He then took his jacket off and did not speak again. I immediately made a prisoner of him, and he seemed to be perfectly aware that he had done it. He [illegible] custody. The deceased was about four yards from the prisoner when he fired. I cannot say whether she was standing with her face towards him, but, after the shot had been fired, and when I observed her staggering, her face was towards him. I [illegible] all of them since we came to Leeds. I have had [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

Thomas Jones, private in the 97th Regiment, stated: I was sentry over the guard room door when the prisoner was brought in on Thursday night. About seven o'clock I asked the prisoner if he was sorry for what he had done? He said "No, he was not." I asked him if he intended to shoot Mrs. Garrard, and he said "Yes." He said he had intended to do it two months before. I asked him if there had been any quarrelling between him and Mrs. Garrard? He said he knew well enough what had taken place, but that he would divulge it to no one except the priest. The prisoner is a Roman Catholic. I asked him if he had any notes among the seven-and-he refused to attend to shoot him instead of Mrs. Garese in the barracks, that he said there was one limb of Lucifer, which he would have shot had he been in the barracks. About half past eight o'clock I told him that Mrs. Garrard was dead. He said he was very happy, he could rest then, which he had not done for three nights previously. He said he was very well satisfied that Mrs. Garrard was dead, that if she had not died he could not have died happy. I asked him when he loaded his musket? and he stated that he loaded it at five o'clock, and placed it in the armoury. He said that the first opportunity he had to shoot the deceased was at seven o'clock. I asked him what he did it for, and he said he had some reason which he would divulge to nobody but the priest.

The Coroner, after cautioning the prisoner, asked him if he had anything to say?

The Prisoner: No, Sir; I have nothing to say.

The Coroner then summed up, and the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against the prisoner, who was committed to take his trial at the next assizes.

FIRE IN BURLINGTON ARCADE.

On Saturday morning last, shortly before five o'clock, the inhabitants of Burlington Arcade were suddenly aroused by the outbreak of a fire of a serious character in the centre of that fashionable place of business, a short notice of which appeared in our paper last week. The house in which the fire broke out, numbered 14, in the tenure of Mr. Russell, a walking-stick dealer; and but it not been for the opportune discovery, it is quite probable that, independently of the large amount of property that has been destroyed, several lives would have been sacrificed.

With all possible expedition the engines of the parish and County Office attended. The fire, by that time, had made extensive, and alarming progress, which the whole arcade appeared doomed to destruction. A strong body of police kept the crowd from filling the entrances to the blazing property, and numerous engines of the London Dock and Sun and Regent Offices were speedily at work, and quick in reaching the scene of conflagration.

About 15 minutes after the first discovery was made, the roof of Mr. Russell's premises fell in, and then the fire burst through the shop and they had previously done. The firemen, nothing daunted, continued at their posts, and some, mounting the roof of the Arcade, were enabled to prevent the flames from extending further towards the outside, while others kept playing torrents of water into the lower parts of the burning property. This had the desired effect, for although the flames were not extinguished, it became manifest that no further destruction of building property would take place. They now worked with full vigour until 8 o'clock, the fire was at length wholly extinguished. That having been accomplished, an inspection was made with a view of finding out the origin of the disastrous affair, but without success. The only conclusion at all probable that could be drawn was, that an escape of gas had been the mischief.

The damage done was considerable, as the injured shops were completely fitted up; many of them contained most valuable stock in trade, and were glazed with large sheets of plate glass.

ALLEGED DEATH FROM VIOLENCE.—On Wednesday an inquest was held at Limon-grove, on the body of James Grove, hay salesman, aged 39, residing at No. 20, Nightingale-street, and known as a public-house, where he had a scuffle with a man named Edward Staunton, a ganger on the docks now in progress at Lambeth for the London Bridge Extension of the South Western Railway. Both fell in the struggle, and the deceased, who was [illegible] complained immediately of severe pain. He was taken home, and after lingering six days in great agony, he died of peritonitis, the result of a rupture of the bladder. The evidence went to show that, in the quarrel, the deceased was the assailant; and the surgical evidence appeared to be that he fell being the cause of death, the Jury returned a verdict of "Died from rupture."

SINGULAR DEATH IN A PRISON.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. Bedford held an inquest in the Tothill-fields prison, on the body of Mrs. Hannah Thomas, aged 48, a lady respectably connected, who was committed from Bow street, on Friday last week, for giving a sovereign with a false appearance. Thomas, it appeared, in answer to questions by the Jury, that the cells were not heated with pipes, but the prisoner had two blankets and a rug. On Sunday she made no complaint. At half-past seven in the morning (Monday) the warder found her lying on the floor with her bed and bed clothes. She spoke to her, but she could not or would not get up. She called Mrs. Anderson, another warder, and she was raised up, but was apparently unable to walk. They, however, put her clothes on. The Coroner: Was no medical assistance sent for? Witness replied in the negative, and that she went to breakfast, and on her return at a quarter past eight the deceased was sitting in the corner where they had left her, talking to herself. The Coroner: Did it not occur to you to send for the surgeon? Witness replied that it did not, for she thought she was "shamming." At twenty minutes past eight, on going to deceased, she appeared dead. Just as the matron was put into a warm bath: and the doctor, having been apprised of her illness, almost immediately attended, but when taken out of the bath she was quite dead. Mr. John Lovles, the surgeon of the prison, stated that he saw the deceased on Saturday, not on account of any illness she complained of suffering, but that she wished him to intercede with the magistrate to revoke her sentence. She spoke of the disgrace of being there, and cried very much. He saw her the next day, but she made no complaint. Mr. Lovles then stated that he had opened the body, and found about a pint of venous blood in the cavity of the chest, which had come from the lungs, and fully accounted for death. After a long-drawn investigation, in which the propriety of wearing the veil in the night was suggested by the Coroner, and the governor of the prison having stated that the warders had no right to give an opinion as to whether the prisoners slammed jil or not, the Jury returned a verdict that the deceased died from natural causes.

FIRE IN THE POULTRY. On Tuesday afternoon a fire broke out in the upper part of the house of Messrs. Prettyman and Rixon, stationers, 29, Poultry. Several engines were soon on the spot, and the fire was subdued in about half an hour.

WESLEYAN MISSIONS.—On Monday evening the anniversary meeting of the Great Queen-street (Lincoln's Inn fields) Branch of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, was held at the Wesleyan Chapel, Great Queen-street, to receive the report of the past year. There were present the Rev. Dr. Beaumont, who presided, the Rev. W. Lomas, the Rev. Mr. Hargreaves, and Mr. Sergeant Wilde. The report, which stated that "without some special effort, the income of the Society would fall far short of the preceding year:" the consequence of which would be, the necessity of giving up some of their missions. In Ireland there had been a decrease in the body of about 500; while in France, Switzerland, and Gibraltar, they had made no advance, except that at the last place there was an increase of their attendance at the schools. In America, New South Wales, Australia Felix, Van Diemen's Land, and South and West Africa, their prospects were flourishing, while it was intended to have a missionary establishment in China. They had in various parts of the world, 294 missionary stations, 2937 chapels and places of worship, 417 mission houses, 771 missionaries, 771 interpreters and school teachers, and 7674 unpaid local preachers, &c. &c. The income of their Branch society was £329 15s. 8d., being a decrease, as compared with the previous year, of £64 12s. The report was received and adopted.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Government are gradually getting a large naval force into commission. Orders arrived at Portsmouth, on Wednesday, for her Majesty's ship Powerful, 84, to be brought forward for sea service, and Captain the Hon. Richard Saunders Dundas, C.B., is to command her. She is to have a crew, at present, of only 380 officers and men. She will, in the first instance, be fitted for the conveyance of troops, like the Bellerophon, and go to sea without her lower-deck guns, and, after being out eight or nine months, return to [illegible] and be completed as a ship of the line in officers, men, and guns. Her Majesty's ships Vanguard, Rodney, Superb, and Cæsopus, have been in commission nearly three years, but are not expected to be relieved for some months.

SALVAGE.—Notice is given also in Tuesday night's Gazette to the officers and company of H.M.'s sloop Wolf, Com. Gordon, that on the 10th day of February next they will be paid their proportions of salvage money for the Kinsale barque Lowther; and the shares will be received every Wednesday and Thursday for three months:—Commander, £148 9s. 8d.; 1st class, £46 5s. 4¾d.; 2d class, £27 16s. 9¾d.; 3d class, £13 7s. 7½d.; 4th class, £9 5s. 0¾d.; 5th class, £4 12s. 6¾d.; 6th class, £3 1s. 8½d.; 7th class, £1 16s. 10d.

PRIZE MONEY. Tuesday night's Gazette gives notice [illegible] December 1846; and that the list will be recalled, at the same place, on Wednesdays and Thursdays only, for the three following months:—Flag, £62 16s 10d; commander, £117 16s. 7d.; 1st class, £39 9s. 2d.; 2d class, £23 13s. 6d.; 3d class, £11 16s. 9d.; 4th class, £7 17s. 10d.; 5th class, £4 12s. 6¾d.; 6th class, £3 1s. 8½d.; 7th class, £1 6s. 3¼d.

THE SLAVE TRADE. Letters from her Majesty's brig Hound have been received up to the 12th of November. She was then lying in St. Helena Roads, having carried thither her fifth prize, a half-deck schooner of eight tons, with 60 slaves on board, which she had captured after a long chase. They were so closely packed, and in such a wretched condition, that [illegible] more and attention bestowed on them by the officers and crew of the Hound, ten of them died before they got to St. Helena. The vessel was burnt after their removal. At the time the Hound arrived there were upwards of 100 prize vessels which had been captured by her Majesty's cruisers, waiting condemnation or reequipping, after having been sold. The greater portion of the slavers are built in America, and sold on the Spanish Main, and are described to be as swift and well-fitted as yachts, so that scarcely any of the sailing men-of-war on the coast can overtake them. After condemnation they are generally purchased by [illegible] from the Brazilian merchants, and get into the slave trade again. A Portuguese ship, the Progresso, was chartered to convey to the Cape of Good Hope all the things saved, and part of the officers and crew, consisting of the sick. The proximity of the Portuguese settlement was very favourable to the security of the shipwrecked, who would otherwise have inevitably been harassed and plundered by the barbarous hordes inhabiting that coast. As the last season was passing on, it was necessary to quit those latitudes. The Voltigeur, which, since the 7th Sept., had made an excursion to Pomba Bay, having returned, took on board 76 men, among whom were Capt. Brown and the officers, some sacks of flour, which had become necessary from the increase of men, and set sail for Mauritius on Oct 5. The Progresso was to leave Mozambique four days later. The Commander of the Snake and his officers having arrived at the Mauritius, would tell of the brave sailors of the Voltigeur to return to Bourbon, where they are expected, before having received a striking mark of their gratitude and esteem. They gave them, the next day, a splendid dinner at the Hotel d'Europe, which, in warm hearted toasts, they took pleasure in expressing to the French seamen the noblest and most affectionate feelings. Frank and cordial replies on the part of the officers of the Voltigeur to their companions of the Snake gave to this brotherly festival a touching character of heartiness and deep sympathy. On Monday morning the Voltigeur continued her voyage to Bourbon, taking with her the agreeable recollection of her new friends, and regret at being so soon separated from them.

WINTER.

DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY.

In the characteristic illustration upon the next page, the Artist has depicted WINTER, surrounded by his terrific attributes of frost, and snow, and storm.

In the centre of the composition, "Winter, the King," with his bare-bough sceptre, is seated in a car, to which are harnessed a band of hungry wolves, driven by an impersonation of "The Spirit of the Storm."

The accessories of the scene are picturesque and appropriate. On one side we see the snow-capped mountain, and, opposite, the pines, the characteristic vegetation of "the icy north." In the right hand corner, and up the mountain-side,

"Subdued by hunger, the poor feathery tribes."

The winter birds perched upon the bare boughs in the spandrels of the picture, complete this scene of wintry terrors.

Yet sweet the [illegible] heard amid the [illegible] and grim'
Assembling wolves in torrent troops And, pouring o'er the country, bear along,
Keen as the north-wind sweeps the glossy snow.
All is their prize. They fasten on the [illegible] alone,
Press him to earth, and pierce his mighty heart.
Nor can the shepherd's awful front defend,
Or shake the murdering savages away
Rapacious, at the mother's throat they [illegible]
And tear the screaming infant from her breast.
The pallid face of man avails him nought.
Even beauty forces divine! [illegible] who o'ercame
The fright'ful gaze.
Grim [illegible] him stands in soften'd gaze,
Heeds a hapless, undish [illegible] prey
But if, [illegible] the scent,
The country he shut up, hurl'd by the scent,
On church-yards drear (inhuman to relate!)
The dampened ted prowlers fall, and dig The shrouded body from th. tomb; o'er which,
M'id with full shrieks, and frightful ghosts, they howl.

MASSACRE OF BRITISH OFFICERS IN KAFFIRLAND.

The Graham's Town Journal, of the 20th of November, contains the following details of the murder of five British Officers, under circumstances of the most savage atrocity:—

"Wednesday, Nov. 17.

"[illegible] has reached us from Kaffraria of the death, by the Kaffirs, of [illegible] Lieutenant W. L. Y. Baker, Lieutenant Faunt, and Ensign Burnop, of the [illegible]rd Regiment; Dr. N. S. Campbell, Surgeon of the corps; and Assistant-Surgeon Loch, of the 7th Dragoon Guards.

"From the [illegible] distressing affair, we gather, in a connected form, the following details.

"It seems that the head-quarters camp is on the Kom[illegible] miles west of the Kye, Colonel Somerset, with a strong force, being in advance, and in position on the heights commanding the Kye drift, at the usual waggon road. At the distance of about seven miles from the [illegible]ere is a conspicuous rock or mountain. The beauties of the country being much spoken of, the ill-fated officers resolved to gratify their curiosity by visiting the spot. On Saturday they started, taking no escort or attendants of any kind, each carrying a double-barrelled gun, more as a precaution than from any apprehension of actual attack. The party on starting were six in number, but, being overtaken by a shower of rain, Lieutenant Littlehales, 73rd Regiment, labouring under a severe cold, resolved, after riding about five miles, to return. It seems that the only approach to the mountain is along a narrow ridge, terminated by a deep and narrow glen, and thence through a valley encumbered with rocks and bush; and it would appear, as far as the traces can be seen, that these officers were permitted to gain the summit of the mountain without molestation. At the same time it is pretty evident that all their movements must have been watched.

[illegible] Somerset, the General [illegible] Campbell, and Captain Bassett, Cape Mounted Rifles, with ten of that corps, started off in quest of the missing party. Traversing the ridge we have described they shortly reached the brow of the declivity leading to the [illegible] into which, at that hour of the night, and with so small a force, it was not deemed [illegible] descend. After pausing, therefore, for a short time, [illegible] were fired as signals; but, hearing [illegible] turned to camp, and on learning [illegible] ordered to start soon after midnight, to renew the search. The force consisted of four companies [illegible] accompanied by Lieutenant Littlehales, to point out the route which he, in company with the others, had pursued on their way out. Shortly after daylight the objects of their search were discovered, dead stripped, and savagely mutilated. From appearances it is conjectured that the unfortunate deceased must have been attacked in passing the valley, but that, on endeavouring to escape, their retreat through the narrow pass at the glen had been completely cut off, and they became easy victims to overwhelming numbers. The spectacle presented was frightful. A letter before us states:—'Mr. Burnop had three balls in his head; Captain Baker was stabbed and mutilated in several places. Poor Dr. Campbell must have suffered greatly, the flesh being actually pared from his body. The naked body of Lieutenant Faunt had been apparently flogged with chains. Their eyes had been scooped out, their teeth extracted, and the head of Assistant-Surgeon Loch had been severed from the body and carried away. The latter, it is supposed, was dragged to some little distance from his companions to a smooth flat stone, and there beheaded. All [illegible] and their [illegible] left on the [illegible] Kaffirs, [illegible] as is assumed, by these officers at the first moment of [illegible]. The poor fellows were buried on Sunday, in one grave; and there was not a dry eye present, from the General downwards.'

"On Sunday morning, Colonel Somerset rode over to the General's camp, where he was in time to witness the return of the detachment with the remains of these unfortunate officers—and it was at once determined to scour the country round the scene of this awful tragedy. Orders were immediately despatched to Colonel Somerset's camp for a detachment, consisting of 150 Cape Mounted Riflemen under Captain Hare, 300 of Captain Hogg's Levy, and 100 Boers, to move towards the scene of the massacre—an order which was so promptly executed that the whole force reached a point a few miles from the General's camp the same night.

THE KAFFIR WAR

Here they were joined by 200 of the 73rd, a troop of the 7th Dragoon Guards under Sir Harry Darrell, and some Kat River Hottentots—the whole under the guidance of Lieutenant Bissett. The General (Sir Geo. Berkeley), with his staff, joined just before daylight. This force was shortly afterwards divided, 100 men of the 73rd, under Major Pinckney, and 100 Provisionals under Capt. Hogg, moving across the right shoulder of the mountain, while 100 men of the 73rd, under Captain Brown, with 150 of Hogg's Levy, and 100 Kat River Levy, ascended its left shoulder. In the meantime, Colonel Somerset, with the Boers, worked to the extreme right, endeavouring to effect the passage of the river below the bend, but which was found to be impracticable, and he then returned to the top of the ride, while the General ascended the face of the mountain, taking up his position on the summit so as to command a fine and distinct view of all the operations below. From this elevation many hundreds of cattle and Kaffirs were seen—the latter having taken up a most favourable position in a large bend of the river, forming a peninsula, only accessible by a narrow rocky ridge, to reach which it was necessary to clamber down some shelving rocks, so precipitous as to be quite impracticable for horsemen. At this point it was seen that the enemy was determined to make a stand; on which the General ordered Lieutenant M'Donald, with a party of the Cape Corps, to move rapidly down the face of the mountain, and if possible force the position. This detachment was the first that reached the point, but was soon joined by Captains Hogg's and Owen's Provisional-, followed by two companies of the 73rd, under Captain Brown, who ... me up in fine skirmishing order, and held the pass while the Provisionals and Cape Corps were scouring the peninsula and skirmishing with the enemy. The Kaffirs showed great determination, but nothing could resist the impetuosity of our troops, who rushed fearlessly over every difficulty, and drove the enemy before them wherever seen. The results of the engagement were 32 Kaffirs killed, and at least double that number wounded, while the only casualties on our side were a few men slightly wounded. Provisionals killed, and one troop horse. Upwards of 300 head of cattle, and several guns, were captured from the Kaffirs, also two of the horses belonging to the deceased officers.

"Colonel Somerset was to attempt the passage of the Kye on the 18th. "The dates of the murdered officers' commissions, as we find them in the Army List for the present month, were as follows:—Major (there is no Captain of the name) W. L. Y. Baker, Nov. 12, 1847. Lieutenant Clarevanix Faunt, July 23, 1842; William Burnup, Ensign and Adjutant, April 23, 1847; Duncan Neil M. Campbell, M.D., Dec. 15, 1846; and Assistant-Surgeon Richard J. Loch, M.D., August 7, 1846."

THE ILLUSTRATION.

The Engraving is from a sketch lately received from a Cape Town Artist. It shows the general character of the vegetation of the country, especially the bush, behind which the Kaffirs lie in wait for the passing waggons, which they attack and plunder with frequent success. The waggon, drawn by yoked oxen, is the usual goods and produce conveyance of the Colony.

SPECIAL COMMISSION IN LIMERICK.

MURDER OF MR. HILL.—ELEVENTH CAPITAL CONVICTION. James Quan, a man about forty years of age, and of rather respectable appearance, was, on Saturday last, indicted for having, on the 18th of November, 1847, wilfully and feloniously murdered one Ralph Hill, at Lord, in the county of Limerick. The indictment contained several counts, and stated, amongst others, that one James Skehan fired a loaded gun at the deceased, and gave him a mortal wound on the ... of which he died, and that the prisoner and others were present aiding and assisting.—The Attorney General shortly stated the facts of the case, in which James Skehan has already convicted of being one of the parties engaged in the murder, if not the person who actually fired the fatal shot. The prisoner's father held a farm within a couple of miles of Limerick, over which Mr. Fitzgerald, of George's-street, Limerick, was agent, and the deceased, Mr. Ralph Hill, was in that gentleman's employment as under agent, and proceeded on the day of the murder to the prisoner's residence, to bring away some corn which was purchased on a previous day at a meeting of the tenantry under a distress for rent, when a shot was fired from the inside of the haggard hedge, which killed him upon the spot. On the same occasion, two other persons who accompanied him were severely wounded. Evidence of the prisoner's guilt having been adduced, he was found guilty and sentenced with Skehan, to be executed on the 22nd of February.

The Court then adjourned to Thursday, February 10.

SPECIAL COMMISSION IN TIPPERARY.—The Commission in this county was opened on Monday. The Grand Jury found true bills in several cases submitted to their consideration. On Tuesday, the charge to the Grand Jury in the case of ... murder of Mr. Roe, in October ... ... night, had not been concluded at the departure of the latest intelligence

RELIEF ASSOCIATION. The usual weekly meeting took place in Conciliation Hall, on Monday. Rent for the week, £109.

PROGRESS OF FEVER. Fever and influenza are now to a serious extent prevailing in a great many parts of the county Antrim. They are both of a malignant description. From some districts applications have been forwarded to Belfast for nurses to attend the fever patients. In several localities the medical man are hardly ever in bed, so often are they obliged to be in attendance on the sick, and in others they are unable to devote sufficient time to the whole of the cases.

MORE DEATHS FROM STARVATION.—A Commissioner, as was stated on Wednesday in our columns, has visited Thurles, in consequence of the ... Archbishop Slattery, and held an investigation at the workhouse into the miserable state of suffering to which the poor of that once wealthy district are reduced. The Commissioner examined the Coroner, Mr. O'Meara, the Sub-Inspector of Police; the resident Magistrate, Mr. Gore Jones, &c. From the statements of these gentlemen, it appeared that the agonies endured by the poor are almost indescribable, and that the law for their relief, as at present administered, is wholly ineffectual. Mr. Jones stated that as an act of mercy to the famishing creatures that thronged the streets, he had some hundreds of them occasionally committed to bridewell, where they were sheltered and fed, otherwise they would have perished of cold and hunger. The evils of the person have become a reproach for the poor! The law, we repeat, is altogether inoperative. Relieving officers, in many cases, are altogether ignorant of their duties. In other cases they are bereft of sufficient assistance; whilst, in others again, they are subject to gross imposition, against which they cannot provide. We have heard, too, that some small landholders, who have taken conacre places, will not take up the land from their wretched tenants' but insist have the rent, or that the tenants in these cases are actually dying of starvation! The poor woman, Quirk, whose suffering fatally was noticed in our last publication, has since died of famine.—Tipperary Vindicator.

LONDON AND GREENWICH RAILWAY. The ... half yearly meeting of the original proprietors of this railway was held on ... esday at their offices in Colemanstreet, W. Cotton, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The Secretary, Mr. Murray, read the statement of accounts, from which it appeared that the net balance to be divided amongst the proprietors was £7261 19s. 10d., ... living a dividend of 3s. 6d. per share. The accounts of the Greenwich Railway were also ... after which the chairman and Mr. Hutchison were re-elected directors, which concluded the meeting.

REMOVAL OF JEWISH DISABILITIES. The example set by Southwark is about to be followed by the other Metropolitan Boroughs. Lambeth had a meeting on Monday; Clerkenwell, Brompton, on Wednesday; Greenwich, on Thursday; and the Tower Hamlets held one on the 1st of February. Lord Russell, Secretary of Statement is also making arrangements, and Finsbury and Marylebone are following the example.

IRISH RENT FRAUD.—We think it necessary to caution the public against a set of swindlers, who are ... actively employed in defrauding parties in the country who ... relatives or friends abroad. They have ... lately arrived, and as the bearers of letters and presents, which ... state is detained at the Liverpool Custom-house, until the payment of the usual duties. It is their plan to introduce themselves to that port, to volunteer their services for the release of the articles, and to obtain money for that purpose. It is almost needless to add that, where they succeed, their dupes never again hear either of presents or money.

CAUTION TO LADIES.—One of the most daring attempts at robbery within our ... lection occurred on Tuesday afternoon, about half-past three o'clock, in Jermy-street, St. James's. ## LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER, MONDAY, JAN. 24

REGINA v. THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

On the 14th inst., a rule, on the motion of Sir F. Kelly, was granted to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, directed to the Lord Archbishop Canterbury, and to his Vicar General, commanding them, or one of them, at a Court to be therefore duly holden, in the business of the Confirmation of the Rev. C. D. Hampden, D.D., to the Bishopric of Hereford, to proceed to hear and appear in due form of law the Rev. R. W. Huntley, the Rev. J. Jebb, and the Rev. W. J. Powell, to oppose the said Confirmation of the said Elect; of the said Dr. Hampden, and to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters, and proofs thereof.

The Attorney-General (with whom were the Solicitor-General, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. M. D. Hill) now showed cause against the said rule

The Court was crowded from an early hour, by members of the bar and other persons anxious to hear the argument

The Attorney-General, in moving that the rule, said that he was instructed to show cause against it, before he proceeded to do so, he had an application to make to the Court, which was that he might be assisted in the argument by a learned friend from Doctors' Commons. The usual course in such cases was to make formal motion to the Court

Lord Denman, after conferring with the other Judges, said the Court would hear one of the learned Doctors on each side

The Attorney-General then stated that he appeared according to the instructions of the Government, and with the full concurrence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to show cause against the rule. He recapitulated the following statement of the facts of the case —

"The sole affidavit upon which this rule has been obtained states that a congé d'elire had been issued to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, accompanied by a letter missive, pointing out the Rev. Dr Hampden as a fit person to be elected as Bishop of that See. On the 26th of December last Dr Hampden was elected, and that election was certified to the Crown under the seal of the Dean and Chapter. Thereupon her Majesty issued her letters patent, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, commanding him to confirm the election, and also to consecrate the Bishop. The Archbishop then issued a Commission, addressed to Dr. Burnaby, his Vicar-General, the Right Hon. Dr. Lushington, and Sir John Dodson, requiring them to proceed to the Confirmation of the Bishop elect, and to cite all persons opposing the Confirmation, and the said Dr. Hampden, to appear at the Arches Court of Canterbury, on the 14th day of January, 1848, to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters, and proofs thereof. The Attorney-General (with whom were the Solicitor-General, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. M. D. Hill) now showed cause against the said rule itself, to the illustration of which he wrote twelve volumes, and projected many more, intending to constitute of them a great work after the manner of Bayle. For many years a history of English literature had been expected from his pen, but his attention seems to have been ultimately diverted from it to his "Commentary on the Life and Reign of Charles I.," an historical labour which procured for him from the University of Oxford the honorary degree of D.C.L. The design thus superseded was subsequently fulfilled partly in his "Amenities of Literature." But, before this, he had produced those memorials of his talents and fame, "The Curiosities of Literature," the "Quarrels and Calamities of Authors," and "The Illustrations of the Literary Character." Mr Disraeli was struck with blindness in 1839, a calamity which did not prevent his publication of the "Amenities of Literature," which his daughter's help enabled him to produce. Mr. Disraeli was an occasional contributor to the Quarterly Review, in early youth he also published some poems and romances, the latter of which were anonymous. Few writers have been so much attached to literature, from a profound love for it, as this indefatigable author. Many a mind has been excited to literary effort and success by his graceful and entertaining lucubrations.

Mr. Disraeli died of influenza on the 19th instant, at his country seat, Bradenham House, Bucks, at the age of eighty-two years. Benjamin Disraeli, Esq., M.P., author of "Contingsby," &c., is his eldest son.

The accompanying Portrait, an excellent likeness, is from a drawing by Count d'Orsay, to whose courtesy our acknowledgments are given for permission to copy the same. The Portrait of the late Mr. Liston, at page 404 of our last volume, we omitted to state, is also from the pencil of Count d'Orsay.

ANCIENT STONE BRIDGE DISCOVERED IN KENT STREET.

THIS curious ancient structure, which has been recently laid open in consequence of making a new sewer along the Kent-road and Kent-street, is situate at the east end of Kent-street, where the new Dover-road joins that street, and nearly opposite to the Bull Inn.

The Bridge was well known to the surveyors and persons employed on the sewers by the name of Lock's Bridge, or the Lock Bridge, from its situation, near to the Loch Hospital for Lepers, formerly existing in Kent-street. It has, however, been completely invisible to the public for many years, the covered sewer having been built up close to each side of it, and the whole completely covered by the road, which is now much wider than the Old Bridge: this consists of a pointed arch of stone, with six ribs, similar to the oldest part of Old London Bridge, to ANCIENT BRIDGE, IN KENT-STREET, SOUTHWARK.

Bow Bridge, and the Bridge at Eltham palace. There are, however, no mouldings to the ribs, which are merely chamfered at the edges. Its date may be about the middle of the fifteenth century. It carried the Old-Kent-road over one of the many streams which intersected that low ground, and which, flowing from the fields of Newington towards Bermondsey, there formed the boundary between the parishes of St. George Southwark and Newington. The width of the Bridge is 20 feet, the span of the arch, 9 feet, and the height 6 feet to the crown of the arch.

In Roque's Map of London, 1750, the stream is laid down, forming a large pool at the Bull Inn, passing under Kent-street by the Bridge in question, and then running eastward along the Kent-road to where the Bermondsey New-road now is, but which was not then made; at this time, too, both sides of the Kent-road, from the Lock Bridge, were lined with hedge-rows.

This Bridge was, probably, a Manorial Bridge, erected by the Monks of Bermondsey Abbey, who were Lords of that Manor of Southwark now called the Great Liberty Manor. No doubt, that old Bridge, if it had memory and thought and speech, could tell its tales of weal and woe—of triumphant entries into the capital—of splendid processions through that now desolate and miserable street—of passing armies—of rebellious insurrections—of pious and weary, and sometimes of merry, pilgrimages to St. Thomas of Canterbury; for, it formed part of the great Kent road, and the general thoroughfare from London to Canterbury, Dover, and the Continent.

This ancient relic has not been injured by the new works, but has of necessity been again concealed from view by the restoration of the road.

MISS CAROLINE LUCRETIA HERSCHEL.

This lady died at Hanover, on the 9th instant, in the ninety-eighth year of her age. We quote the following correct necrology of her from the Athenæum:—

Caroline Lucretia Herschel "was the fourth daughter of Isaac Herschel and Anna Ilse Moritzen, his wife, and sister to the celebrated astronomer of that name, as well as the constant companion and sole assistant of his astronomical labours, to the success of which her indefatigable zeal, diligence, and singular accuracy of calculation not a little contributed. She was born in Hanover on the 16th of March, 1750, where she resided under the parental roof till her twenty-second year, when she joined her brother, then actively engaged in the musical profession at Bath, in England, a country which was destined to be her home for half a century. There, from the first commencement of his astronomical pursuits, her attendance on both his daily labours and nightly watches was put in requisition; and was found so useful, that on his removal to Datchet, and subsequently to Slough for having them occupied with his reviews of the heavens and other researches she performed the whole of the arduous and important duties of his astronomical assistant, not only reading the clocks and noting down all the observations from dictation as an amanuensis, but subsequently executing the whole of the extensive and laborious numerical calculations necessary to render them available to science, as well as a multitude of others relative to the various objects of theoretical and experimental inquiry in which, during his long and active career, he at any time engaged. For the performance of these duties, his Majesty King George the Third was graciously pleased to place her in the receipt of a salary sufficient for her singularly moderate wants and retired habits.

"Arduous, however, as these occupations must appear, especially when it is considered that her brother's observations were always carried on (circumstances permitting) till daybreak, without regard to season, and indeed chiefly in the winter, they proved insufficient to exhaust her activity. In their intervals she found time both for actual astronomical observations of her own and for the execution of more than one work of great extent and utility.

"The observations here alluded to were made with a small Newtonian sweeper constructed for her by her brother; with which, whenever his occasional absences or any interruption to the regular course of his observations permitted, she searched the heavens for comets, and that so effectively as on no less than eight several occasions to be rewarded by their discovery viz. on Aug. 1, 1786; Dec. 21, 1788; Jan. 9, 1790; April 17, 1790; Jan. 15, 1791; Oct. 7, 1793; Nov. 7, 1795; and Aug. 6, 1797). On five of these occasions (recorded in the pages of the 'Philosophical Transactions' of London) her claim to the first discovery is admitted. These sweeps moreover proved productive of the detection of several remarkable nebulæ and clusters of stars previously unobserved, among which may be specially mentioned the superb Nebula, No. 1, Class V. of Sir William Herchel's catalogues—an object whose resemblance to the celebrated nebula in Andromeda, discovered by Simon Inarius—is also the Nebula V. No. 18; the 19th and 27th clusters of Class VII., and the 45th, 65th, 72d, 77th, and 78th, of Class VIII. of those catalogues.

"The astronomical works which she found leisure to complete were—1st. 'A Catalogue of 561 Stars observed by Flamsteed,' but which, having escaped the notice of those who framed the British Catalogue, the government's observations, are not therein inserted: 2. 'A General Index of Reference to every Observation of every Star inserted in the British Catalogue.' These works were published together in one volume by the Royal Society; and to their utility in subsequent researches Mr. Bally, in his 'Life of Flamsteed,' pp. 388, 390, bears ample testimony. She further completed the reduction and arrangement as a Catalogue of all the nebulæ and clusters of stars observed by her brother in his sweeps; a work for which she was honoured with the Gold Medal of the Astronomical Society of London, in 1828; which Society also conferred on her the unusual distinction of electing her an honorary member.

"On her brother's death, in 1822, she returned to Hanover, which she never again quitted, passing the last twenty-six years of her life in repose—enjoying the society and cherished by the regard of her remaining relatives and friends—gratified by the occasional visits of eminent astronomers—and honoured with many marks of favour and distinction on the part of the King of Hanover, the Crown Prince, and his amiable and illustrious Consort.

"To within a very short period of her death her health continued uninterrupted, her faculties perfect, and her memory (especially of the scenes and circumstances of former days) remarkably clear and distinct. Her end was tranquil and free from suffering—a simple cessation of life."

The writer of this very interesting memoir has, however, omitted to state, that besides being an Honorary Member of the Royal Astronomical Society, Miss Herschel was also similarly honoured by the Royal Irish Academy.

The accompanying portrait is copied, by permission, from a picture in the possession of Sir John Herschel, believed to be the only portrait of any authenticity. It very strongly recals Miss Herschel's air and appearance in 1839, when the picture was painted; i. e., when the lady was in her 89th year.

We append the following just and eloquent tribute to the merits of Miss Herschel, from Dr. Nichol's "Views of the Architecture of the Heavens:"—

"The astronomer (Sir William Herschel), during these engrossing nights, was constantly assisted in his labours by a devoted maiden sister, who braved with him the inclemency of the weather—who heroically shared his privations that she might participate in his delights—whose pen, we are told, committed to paper his notes of observations as they issued from his lips; 'she it was,' says the best of authorities, 'who, having passed the nights near the telescope, took the rough manuscripts to her cottage at the dawn of day, and produced a fair copy of the night's work on the ensuing morning; she it was who planned the labour of each succeeding night, who reduced every observation, made every calculation, and kept everything in systematic order;' she it was—Miss Caroline Herschel—who helped our astronomer to gather an imperishable name. This venerable lady has in one respect been more fortunate than her brother; she has lived to reap the full harvest of their joint glory. Some years ago, the gold medal of our Astronomical Society was transmitted to her to her native Hanover, whither she removed after Sir William's death; and the same learned Society has recently inscribed her name upon its roll: but she has been rewarded by yet more, by what she will value beyond all earthly pleasures; she has lived to see her favourite nephew, him who grew up under her eye into an astronomer, gather around him the highest hopes of scientific Europe, and prove himself fully equal to tread in the footsteps of his father."

THE LATE MISS CAROLINE LUCRETIA HERSCHEL.

INTERESTING ARCHÆOLOGICAL DISCOVERY.

THE St. Alban's Architectural Society have lately caused some excavations to be made upon the site of the ancient Verulamium, and the result is important to every archæologist, as well as to every one who takes an interest in Romano-British history.

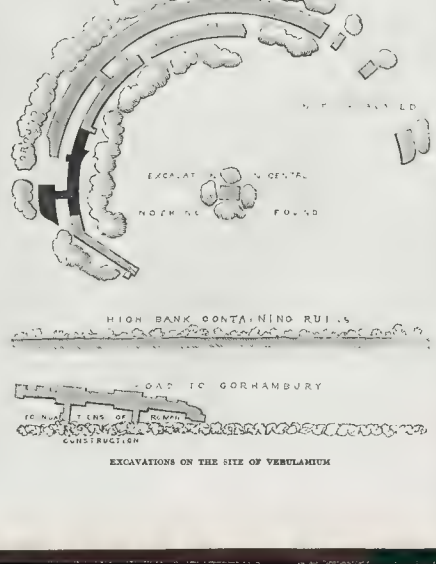
At the Council Meeting of the British Archæological Association, on the 22d ult., Mr. Roach Smith stated that he had recently visited these excavations; and a Correspondent has enabled us to illustrate them in the accompanying plan. We should state that they are under the superintendence of Mr. Grove Lowe and the Rev. Dr. Nicholson. "They were commenced," says the Literary Gazette report, "on the right side of the high road leading to Gorhambury, beyond St. Michael's Church, owing to the attention of Mr. Lowe being directed to a mass of flint masonry which projected from the bank. At this spot, the outer walls of a building of considerable magnitude have been laid open. In the lower part of the large field on the opposite side of the road, the foundations of another extensive building are being brought to light. It is almost semi-circular, with a double wall, the outer being six feet in width, the inner, three feet, with a gallery of about four feet between; near the termination, at one side of the inner, are the remains of small chambers or rooms; the width across this building is about sixty paces. There is every reason to believe that this large edifice may have been a theatre; its dimensions and form suggest a public use; and in perforating the centre, the made earth appears to be at least five feet deep, showing a considerable slope inwards from the walls. The Earl of Verulam, with great kindness and good feeling, has permitted a full exploration to be made; and it is to be hoped that every assistance will be rendered the St. Alban's Architectural Society in their laudable exertions in investigating a site so pregnant with valuable remains. Mr. Smith stated that he believed the entire plan of the ancient city might be discovered, with the foundations of most of the buildings, public and private.

"The walls of the edifices just opened have been cleared away almost to the last course of stones and tiles, most probably for materials to construct the Abbey on the hill opposite. Coins of the Constantine family, of Valens, and Gratian, have been found, as well as fragments of various kinds of pottery, marble, &c."

From a subsequent communication, we learn that every day brings to light additional evidence in corroboration of the opinion expressed by the antiquaries who have examined the remains, namely, that the building was rather more than a Theatre. Return walls have been found; and near the spot where the proscenium was placed, a tesselated pavement has been traced; but, on account of the frost, it has only been partially opened. The area of the Theatre (thirty paces across) has not yet been cleared; and, as the depth of soil in the centre where it has been probed, is at least twelve feet, the expense will be considerable. The British Archæological Association have given the local Society £5, in aid of the excavations, and, we understand, the Archæological Institute have followed the example, by a similar donation; but it is hoped that the Government will be disposed to do what would have been immediately done by any Continental Government under similar circumstances, namely, grant a sum adequate to ensure the complete investigation of one of the most interesting and unexplored sites in the kingdom.

The last plan of the Remains was exhibited on Friday (yesterday) evening, at the meeting of the Association, at Sackville-street.

In an adjoining column will be found detailed an ancient Bridge in Southwark, which has just been brought to light by one of the most active members of the British Archæological Association



EXCAVATIONS ON THE SITE OF VERULAMIUM

SCENE FROM "DIOGENE," AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE

"THE WIFE AND CHILD OF OSCEOLA."

THIS picture, painted by a North American Indian artist, has lately been brought to London by Colonel Sherburne, who has applied, through the American representative here for a channel by which to present the painting to the Queen. The picture portrays Pe-o-ka, the wife of OSCEOLA, the principal War Chief of the Seminoles, in Florida, and her Son, on hearing of his treacherous capture under the white flag, his imprisonment, and death in a dungeon, by the American General, after a seven years' war with the Seminole tribe.

As a pendent, we give the following poem from Mrs. Sigourney to Colonel Sherburne. It is founded on an incident during the war with the Seminoles in Florida, and while the last struggle was being made to save their hunting-grounds and homes from the grasp of the white man. While Colonel Sherburne was in the Cherokee nation, completing a treaty with that powerful tribe, which had for so many years caused great inquietude on the borders, and which he happily accomplished, he received instructions from the Government to take a delegation of the Cher[illegible] (with the assent of the Nation), and proceed to Florida, directly to the camps of the Seminole Chiefs, and endeavour to persuade them to [illegible] the olive-branch, sign a treaty of lasting peace, and remove West. The success of Colonel Sherburne, and the termination of that long and bloody war, is already well known. Osceola, the principal war-chief, with his wife, visited the white flag, and, under this emblem of peace, took the trail for St. Augustine, there to [illegible] the treaty, but, when near Fort Peyton, a few miles from St. Augustine, the chief and his warriors were [illegible] surrounded by the American dragoons, dispatched by the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, and, not heeding the white flag, were [illegible] and marched under guard to St. Augustine, and there cast into the damp dungeon of Castle Marion. Some weeks after, the brave, young, heroic Osceola died of a broken heart, while surrounded by his wife, children, and weeping warriors, in a dismal dungeon. While sick, he gave to his friend, Col. Sherburne, his war plumes, turban, pipe of peace, and some other relics to remember him, also a lock of his hair. The day he died, his head was severed from his body, and placed in a vase of spirits, and now adorns the shelf of an apothecary in St. Augustine, Florida. His body was taken by the surgeons, and the headless skeleton of the chief may now be seen in the closet of a physician of note in Charleston, South Carolina. We may, therefore, well preface the beautiful lines of Mrs. Sigourney with the unanswerable question, Where is Osceola's grave?

Red Eagle of the southern sky,
That dar'd the king of day!
Who brought thee from thine eyrie proud
To grovel in the clay?

High heart and brave! who struck thee down?
No blood thy plumes distained,
No arrow from the archer's bow
Thy heaving bosom pained.

What check'd thy pinions soaring [illegible]
What dimm'd thy piercing [illegible]
Thy pale-fac'd brother knows the fact,
But renders no reply.

Why plants he not some cypress tree
O'er thy lone resting place?

Why breathes he not the dirge for thee,
Oh, noblest of thy race!

But lo! a sudden requiem flow'd,
In wild unmeasur'd tide—
For pitying nature gave the strain
That haughty man denied.

A moaning bird from rifled nest
Pour'd forth a tuneful [illegible]
And with sad melody detain'd
The ear of parting day.

So, where by balmy breezes fann'd
The dark palmettos wave,
That lonely minstre[illegible] o'er
O'er Osceola's grave.

Thus fell Osceola, the Seminole War-Chief of Florida, after battling to defend his country (which had been held by his tribe for two centuries), with only about 1200 warriors, against 10,000 troops and 1200 horse, for seven years. At last, to make sure of the great Chief, the American General condescended to take him by treachery, in which he succeeded, as appears above, which we take from an American paper.

THE LOST "AVENGER."—One or two circumstances relating to the unfortunate [illegible] their interesting nature, and the [illegible] tor of her officers, deserve to be made known. [illegible] Lisbon to proceed to the Mediterranean [illegible] Mediterranean [illegible] Bay of Gaeta [illegible] Mr. M. Murray [illegible] round the neck with both arms, and so completely paralysed his exertions that Lieutenant Master of the [illegible] First Lieutenant (Hugh Newman) threw himself overboard, and succeeded in bringing his brother officer and the boy safely alongside the ship. But the circumstance which renders this anecdote remarkable is, that the boy, who could not swim, is one of the few, who out of the whole crew of the steamer, were saved by the cutter which left her on the night of the wreck and landed on the coast of Africa.—Malta Times

FRENCH PLAYS.

THE grand classic play of Diogène has been produced with some care at the St. James's Theatre, we presume rather to give M. Bocage an opportunity of exhibiting his talent in representing the part of that cynical philosopher, than on account of any very high merit in the piece itself. The author, M. [illegible] Pyat, has treated his subject, as Frenchmen treat all subjects, with a thorough French nationality—the play savouring more of modern Paris than of ancient Athens. If it does not, however, possess the merit of a sincere and purely classical handling of the subject, it is that of a certain flashy cleverness, and by placing Diogenes in a variety of situations more or less probable, by introducing most of the sayings attributed to him, and, by bringing him in contact with the celebrated characters of his period, an effective rôle has been created, to which M. Bocage does every justice. His elocution in the most [illegible] was almost [illegible], but his delivery of the [illegible] and satirical [illegible] out not only [illegible] and deportment which, [illegible] and [illegible] In the present part his head was constantly turned upwards, as if in scorn of all his race, and his features wore a contracted look of contempt, that seemed to have grown [illegible] and to have become part and parcel of his countenance. Perhaps, the [illegible] scene was the one in which Diogenes in his tub, or rather barrel, was visited, so to speak, by all the "beauty and talent" of the [illegible] capital, [illegible] has selected for illustration. Beyond th[illegible], are there who could [illegible] M. C[illegible] was good in the character of a robb[illegible] orator, [illegible] of fun whenever he was on the stage. The trifling part of Laïs was, made the most of by the pretty Mdlle. Logier.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

EVERY man having a head of game of his own or his neighbour's—within his reach, was up and at it during the present week. Ah! red-brown partridges! Ah! brilliant pheasants! for you, albeit the season was "frosty," yet was it far from "kindly" also. When, during the periods of their lawful exercise, hunting, coursing, and steeple-chasing are interrupted by the rainy influences of the time, then the great resource of those who, in the pursuit of field sports, "lead amicosal lives." But, should those pastimes be frown up towards the end of January—

Short of them, many tribes who happen to be without a taste for shooting themselves, and possess souls of enterprise with the means of ministering to them, repair to the metropolis when country air is down at zero. For this reason we have lately had many peculiar-looking characters about the streets—scores of them "chokers" in our streets, and a far better muster at the Corner than heretofore; still, though the market had more the appearance of business than has been its wont, it was little more than sauntering. Specimens of the native fauna of the spring gives it vitality—there is no forcing the odds. Moreover, there is a greater variety of turf crops now than in former years. When the Derby was the cynosure of the ring from November to May, there always a little dying upon it. Now the Chester Cup is a formidable rival—among the really industrious it has rather the call of the great three-year-old race. Already in words or a score of animals have been backed for it, and before the day arrives the "talent," friends and friends of one sort or another. Thus it will be a source of certain profit to those—who are paid their winnings; this we may anticipate without fear of misleading the reader. The engagements for the Chester Cup are to be finally declared on or before the first of February; therefore, up to Tuesday next, "gentleman being so fortunate as to possess a courser backed for that issue, may lay against it with complete confidence as he has only to "scratch" his nag, and put the balance to the credit of his book. That this will be the case with some now in the betting—that is to say so far as the result will affect the public—is not improbable. Fair as the handicap undoubtedly is, one cannot canvass the list of the "taken" at Tattersall's without feeling that there is something odorous in the word—a monkham one instance. A few days will set all to rights, and, in the meantime, the curious had better not expose themselves to the possibility of illustrating the proleun The range, to be sure, is very extensive, the layer having thirty five against the field—and barring the favourite. But there will be ample scope for fancy even after Tuesday shall have weeded the present field, or rather prairie. In the Derby, as presented, there is no movement. The form is corpse, those who have the odds quoted against Glendower, Springy Jack, Assault, and Cervus, will have no reason to regret their investments Next week we will deal with the Chester acceptances.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY The Chester betting improves daily, and is likely to furnish as many "pots" as ever; at present, we have only Blaze, Kelesbe, Jonathan Wild, Cracow, Giselle, and Rufus in great request, but have no doubt that every week will add to the number; we anticipate a very large acceptance. The Derby betting shows a slight decline in Beshorough, and a marked improvement in Kerrim, who is described to be "all over a blood horse." We give the final averages this afternoon :—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A very moderate supply of English wheat has been received [illegible] this week, and the demand for it has been extremely limited. The arrivals have, however, been tolerably good. The sales of samples to-day were moderately extensive, but the demand for most kinds was far from active, at Monday's quotations. Really fine parcels of foreign wheat sold slowly, at full prices. In other kinds of grain, the transactions were [illegible] scanty, and without spirit, and fair requests. ## MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Another difficulty in the employment of money has recently developed itself. Among the varied description of securities tendered for advances with bankers and bill brokers, none was preferred to foreign Bills But the recent failures in the Continent, so extensive in their character, and with every probability of increasing, have materially to-day to shake the almost implicit confidence with which they have been hitherto regarded. Each paper Bills and loans on Stock have, therefore, for some time past, been largely resorted to, by discount houses, as investments for their capital left on loan, or "call." This species of investment necessarily had its limits, and the almost valueless state of capital on the Stock Exchange shows it to be, for the present, an exhausted resource. Under these circumstances, it is not very surprising to learn that the large discount house of Messrs. Overend, Gurney, Gurney, and Lubeck, of Gottenburgh, was mentioned on 'Change on Saturday. This house has been but a short time in the timber trade Its debts are not supposed to be heavy.

The payment of the dividend, which is usually proposed to be made by Messrs. Perkins, Schlusser, and Mullins, will be on and after the 29th inst. This fixture, it appears, about to dissolve. Mr. Perkins will probably retire from business altogether, while Mr. Schlusser becomes associated with the opulent firm of Messrs. J. H Schroder and Co., from which Mr. Post withdraws on account of ill health, having realised an ample competency. Mr. Mullins will carry on the business of Messrs. Perkins, Schlusser, and Mullens, in conjunction with a partner of ample means.

The news from India, on Tuesday, confirm the view already expressed, that the accounts on the whole are less unfavourable than might have been anticipated. The only failures announced at Calcutta, in consequence of the news, have not been of a character to create much alarm. They were those of Messrs Colville, Gilmore, and Co., the correspondents of Hankey, Brothers, and Co.; and B. T. Ford and Co., the correspondents of Reeves, Little, and Co. The Union Bank of Calcutta has also suspended its discounts, but this step had been presented, and hopes were entertained that the establishment would not be irretrievably broken up. As regards Messrs. Lambe, Rundell, and Co., the correspondents of Smith, Payne, and Smiths, however, greater firmness is needed, in consequence of the reduction in the rate of discount by the Bank of England; it also had a favourable influence on Exchequer Bills, and India Bonds improved. The market for English Securities closed firmly at the following rates :—Bank Stock, 204; Reduced, 89½; Three per Cent Consols Annuities, 89¼; New Three-and-a-Quarters per Cent Annuities, 90; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 5, 1860, 8 15-16; Ditto, Oct. 10, 1860, 9¼; Ditto, to expire Jan. 5, 1860, 8⅞; Ditto 30 years, 1880, 15; India Stock, 239; Bank Stock for Account, 201; Consols for Account, 89⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 32 premium; Ditto, £500, 33 premium.

In the Foreign House, Spanish, on Monday, advanced, the Five per Cents closing at 20¾ ⅞; Three per Cent., 30½ ⅝. The cause was better prices from Madrid, particularly as regards the Active stock. Each successive finance Minister has his favourite description of stock, to serve his own and friends' turn; so it may be inferred that Actives are the present Minister's choice. These prices, as our last shows, have been the result of the Queen's marriage Stock is rather lower, and Mexican maintains its price, although there is not been any transactions of consequence. The closing list gives quotations as follows :—Brazilian 5 per Cents, 84¾; Chilian, 6 per Cents, 90; Spanish Actives, 3; Passive, 3; Deferred, 6 per Cents, 41. Portuguese 5 per Cents, 30; Ditto, 4 per Cent, 26; Spanish 5 per Cent., 1840, 50¾; Ditto, Account, 49; Ditto, 1841, 49; Ditto, Coupons, 19¾; Ditto, Passive, 4¾; Ditto, Deferred, 3¾; Ditto, 3 per Cent., 30¾; Account Bonds, 24 per Cent., 39; Dutch 2½ per Cent., 12 Guild., 53⅝; Ditto, 4 per Cent Certificates, 85¾.

Railway Stocks displayed some animation at the beginning of the week Eastern Counties, Blackwall, and Great Northerns registering an advance. London and Oxford Junction, 24¾ Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 24¾; Bristol and Exeter, 65; Caledonian, 20½; East Anglia, 4⅝, L. and L. and D., 12¾; Ditto, £30 10s., E. and H., 13; Eastern Counties, 15¾; Ditto, Northern and Eastern, 7¾; Great Northern, 84; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 24½; Great North of England, 238; Ditto, New, £15, 24¾. N. E. Preference, 9½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 77; Northern of France, 11½; Sambre and Meuse, 7½; London and Westminster, 24.

SATURDAY MORNING. Buoyancy again was the characteristic of the market yesterday. Consols advanced to, and closed at, 89¾ for Money, and 89¾ for the February Account. Foreign Funds did not materially vary. Shares were heavy, at previous quotations.

M. JEAN POLASKI, AT ASTLEY'S.

ASTLEY'S.

We this week give one of the most effective "Scenes in the Circle" at this popular theatre—the daring feat of Jean Polaski, on two fleet steeds, as "The British Fox-hunter." Thus doubly mounted, Polaski chases a live fox round the circle, leaping over four gates in his course. There is something purely national in the scene, and it has been received with great applause.

The performances of Mr. Lavater Lee, the wonderful vaulter, also form a feature in the circle. Astley's has come in for more than a usual share of patronage during the holiday tide. "The Camp of Silesia," is, as we have before stated, a very superior piece of its kind; and where could Dr. Syntax be more properly furnished with a horse than on the equestrian stage; albeit Grizzle is not a specimen of the Astley's stud.

THE WEATHER FOR THE PAST QUARTER.

THE Quarterly Report of the Registrar General, just published, is more than usually interesting, both with respect to the great mortality which has prevailed during the quarter, and also for the unusual weather which has been prevalent. The Quarterly Meteorological Returns are obtained from twenty-nine places, situated at different parts of the country, and these have all been examined and reduced by James Glaisher, Esq., and therefore confidence may be placed in their results.

The following remarks by Mr. Glaisher, are appended to the Report. The average referred to is always to be understood as that for the preceding six years.

"The weather during the past quarter has been very remarkable in many respects. The daily temperature of the air, evaporation, and dew-point, during the whole quarter, with the exception of the period between November 17 and November 21, and between December 20 and December 31, have been above the average, and at times these departures have been great.

"The mean temperature of the air for October was 52 deg. 9; for November was 46 deg 9; and for December was 43 deg. 8; which values exceeded those of the average by 4 deg. 2, 2 deg. 7, and 3 deg. 3, respectively; or, the mean value for the quarter was 47 deg. 5, exceeding the average by 3 deg. 4; and this excess is very large indeed, considering that it extends over so long a period as one-fourth part of a year.

"The mean temperature of the dew-point for the quarter was 44 deg. 3, which is 3 deg 3 above the average.

"The mean weight of water mixed with a cubic foot of air was 3·2 grains, which is about one-eighth part greater than the average.

"The mean reading of the barometer was 29·520 inches, which is 0·111 inch above the average. The amount of rain fallen within the quarter was six inches; which is two inches less than the average. The fall in the year 1847 was 17·6 inches, which is nearly eight inches less than the average.

"The amount of heat radiated from the Earth at night during the quarter was very small. The mean amount of cloud was such as to cover a little more than three-fourths of the whole sky. The month of December was more clouded than any month since January, 1845.

"It is a fact well worthy of notice, that from the beginning of this quarter till the 20th of December, the electricity of the atmosphere was almost always in a neutral state, so that no signs of electricity whatever were shown for several days together. On the above day, and on every day afterwards till the end of the quarter, active electricity was shown.

"The remarkable cold period between November 17 and November 21, seems to have been general all over the country. Snow fell within this period to a considerable depth in Suffolk, but it is not noticed as having fallen elsewhere. During November and December the usual diurnal rise and fall of the temperatures of the air and dew-point very frequently did not take place, and they were often reversed; a nocturnal rising temperature and a daily falling temperature were of frequent occurrence.

"The usual diurnal change in the barometer readings did not take place; the readings, at times, constantly increased for several days together, and then decreased for several days together. In December, on the 7th day, at 3h. A.M., the remarkably low reading of 28·383 inches took place at Greenwich; and this low reading was general over the country, but it first took place at northern places, and then at southern; thus the minimum occurred at Durham, on Dec. 6, at 6h. P.M., and it was 27·89 inches; at Stonyhurst, near Blackburn, during the evening, and it was 27·841 inches; at Liverpool, at 10h. P.M., and it was 28·164 inches; at Cambridge, on December 7, at 1h. 30m. A.M., and it was 28·382 inches; and at Greenwich, on December 7, at 3h. A.M., as stated above, 28·383 inches. A reading so low, as this is of rare occurrence. The previous instances at Greenwich are as follows:—In 1783, on March 6, the reading was 28·12 inches; in 1809, on December 17, the reading was 28·20 inches; in 1821, on December 28, the reading was 27·80 inches; in 1834, on November 23, the reading was 28·37 inches; and in 1843, on January 15, the reading was 28·10 inches."

During the quarter there were eight exhibitions of the Aurora Borealis, which occurred on the following days: October 15, 23, and 24; November 1, 2, and 19; December 2 and 19. That on October 24 was particularly referred to in our journal.

From the preceding remarks it will be seen, that the weather during the past quarter has been very unusual indeed. Mr. Glaisher states, that he has searched all meteorological records at his command, which have been made in the previous fifty years, and he has failed to find any season of similar character. To the Report are appended very extensive Meteorological Tables.

WILLIAM MILLER.

BOATSWAIN OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAMER "AVENGER."

AMONGST the unfortunate persons who lost their lives in this ill-fated vessel, was William Miller, her boatswain, better known by his fund of anecdote, as Jos Miller. A finer fellow never stept on a vessel's deck. To his herculean frame, born to brave the fiercest storms, was added a heart that was made of the right stuff to set off to advantage his iron frame; and in his short but perilous life, he had need of it. "Joe" was, in fact, the very beau ideal of a British sailor. We feel, therefore, some interest in tracing his chequered life, through his varied course of daring peril, and mishap. All who knew him must lament that such a life should have been brought to such an end.

William Miller was born at Warrington, in Lancashire, about the year 1802; he was of Scottish parents, in humble life, and by his own account was the youngest and smallest of the family; but our Correspondent adds that he has never seen a finer stature of a man. In height he was about 5 feet 10½ inches, weighing 17 stone; he possessed amazing muscular power; his arm was 19½ inches in circumference, and he possessed a frame of equal proportions. In his early youth he had a predilection for the sea, and at the age of eleven went on board of a merchant ship, apprenticed to the late William Mellish, Esq., bound to the South Seas. He then entered the American navy; and was next on board an ill-fated whaler, which was cut off by the natives, at the Society Islands. The narration of his exile and his many miraculous escapes, if told in his own language, would fill a volume; how he was sold from one tribe to another, until he engaged in the "Patriot" service. He subsequently became Coxswain to Lord Cochrane (now the Earl of Dundonald) when on board the Chilian States Ship, the O'Higgins," and was present at the memorable capture under the batteries of Callao, of the Spanish flag ship Esmeralda, by his Lordship, on the night of the 5th of November, 1820. Miller was the first man on board; he drew the first blood of the sentry who attempted to oppose his progress, and by one blow of his sword from his powerful arm, Miller laid his antagonist headless! A corroborative circumstance occurred twenty years afterwards on board the Royal yacht steamer Watermitch, which shows the modesty of the man. On the latter occasion, Lord Cochrane paid a visit to this brig, on board of which Miller was boatswain; he was recognised by his Lordship, who called the commander's attention to Miller, and enquired his name, which, being told, Lord Cochrane called Miller aft, and asked him if he knew him, or had sailed together in such a ship (referring him to the Esmeralda); and on asking him who was the first man on board? Miller gave that honour to his Lordship, stating that "he was, however, close upon his heels." Lord Cochrane remarked to his friends around him, "that man wants to give me the credit, but 'twas he who was the first on board." Shortly after the capture of the Esmeralda, Miller returned to England and entered the navy. In 1831, we find him acting boatswain of his Majesty's ship Prince Regent; and, application having been made by the late Vice-Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron, Lord Dundas, for a suitable boatswain, Miller was recommended by his Lordship, and permitted to join the yacht. This vessel, the Watermitch, was subsequently purchased into the Royal navy, and Miller was discharged, he applied to be re-stated in the service, but being disappointed, he again entered the merchant service, returned to Cowes, and superintended the fitting out of a new Southseaman, the Samuel Enderby, which was built at that port, and on board which vessel he sailed mate. As a compliment to him, the owners, the Messrs. Enderby, caused a Portrait of Miller to be taken, from which our present Sketch has been made. Subsequently, Miller accepted the command of the British schooner Darung, of Cowes, which was then open, and was engaged in the Mediterranean and foreign trade. On that vessel being sold, he was engaged, for about twelve months, by Mr. Pitcher, the shipbuilder, of Blackwall and Northfleet, as rigger, in the equipment of several steam-vessels for the Neapolitan Government; he was subsequently employed, in the same capacity, by Mr. Laird of Birkenhead, and he sailed as mate of the East India iron brig Clyde, built by that gentleman. This vessel was wrecked at the Cape de Verd Islands, on her voyage out; when Miller, having lost his all, returned home, and once more made application for a petty officer's berth in the navy. He succeeded, (through Admiral Sir George Cockburn,) in getting made acting boatswain's mate of H.M.S. Daring, and sailed in her with the Experimental Brig Squadron. During the past year we find him acting boatswain of the Scourge, from which he was lately transferred to the Avenger, and joined that ill-fated vessel but a few days before the melancholy catastrophe which terminated his eventful life, in the 45th year of his age.

W. MILLER, BOAT-WAIN OF THE LATE STEAM-SHIP "AVENGER."

Although education had not done much for our hero, nature had amply endowed him with practical abilities; and, in justice to his memory, be it said, that he was a neat and excellent naval draughtsman, a good navigator, a thorough seaman, and a first-rate rigger and disciplinarian; and, though his herculean figure might inspire terror in the timid, his mild countenance and amiable disposition would instantly disarm it. He was also a good father and kind husband. He lived at Cowes, and was much respected by all who knew him. We regret to add that he has left a wife and two children.

The following is an official return of the names of all the officers who were on board the Avenger when she left Malta:—

THE TWO FERDINANDS.

Sicily, according to Mr. Carker, in Dickens's latest recorded conversation of that worthy, is "the idlest and easiest part of the world." The description is true enough in ordinary times, but singularly inaccurate at the present moment. Sicily is now quite the reverse of idle; and life, so far from being "easy" there, is a condition of the utmost anxiety and peril. The whole island is in a state of insurrection, and Palermo, the capital, has been bombarded; foreign residents have been driven to take refuge on board ship; the local Government has been deposed; and the King forced to make concessions that look very like a capitulation. In the midst of all the cannonading, slaughter, and confusion, life in Sicily must have been, for some time, very "idle" and "easy" indeed.

What has just happened there is the continually recurring result of that system of Government, which cant calls paternal, and truth tyrannical. Men must be essentially ungrateful, for their hatred of the fatherly care taken of them by such Monarchs as those of Austria and Naples is most intense. Nor is the hatred of the ruler for the ruled much less hearty; between the two sentiments, no ten years of "paternal government" ever passes without a most unfilial rebellion, and a most unfatherly massacre as the consequence—if the "pater" is strong enough.

The King of Naples, who has just granted to his Sicilian subjects what are facetiously called "concessions," seeing that they are extorted by force of arms, is one of those Monarchs of whom the Bourbon race has been prolific. Ignorant, bigoted, and self-willed, he is firmly persuaded that the section of the human race he governs was made over to him by Providence as a property or chattel, to be dealt with as he thinks fit. It is a delusion very incident to Kings in general, and the Bourbons in particular; but, unhappily, their subjects have just the contrary opinion. As long as an army can keep down all expression of this opinion, things go on well enough; but if the mass "plucks up a spirit," and beat the soldiers, the Father of his people has nothing for it but to make concessions, swear to observe them, pass an act of amnesty and pardon to all political offenders; bide his time, break his oath, and hang as many of the leaders as he can catch, on the first opportunity. That is the beginning, middle, and end of the epic of every revolution under the Bourbon family, whether in Spain, France, or Italy.

There is another illustration of the effect of despotic Government, no less striking, to be drawn from another part of Italy. There is a Ferdinand in Vienna and a Ferdinand in Naples; they resemble each other much like the "river in Macedon and the river in Monmouth," according to Fluellin's ground of comparison, which was founded on there being "salmons in both." There are two Kings, and tyranny is the principle of Government of each; and in Italy the results of their policy are becoming apparent, also, with great similarity.

The Emperor Ferdinand of Austria governs Lombardy, and the "paternal" affection he bears his Italian subjects has resulted in a massacre of the people of Milan. Some discontent is not unnaturally felt at this sabreing and shooting; to repress which a hundred thousand Austrian troops are on their march to the south of the Alps, under a General who has issued as savage a proclamation as Absolutism ever indited; the "double clawed eagle" is to teach the murmuring Milanese that its hold on them is not to be relaxed.

The arrival of the troops is preceded by persecution; some of the best citizens are already imprisoned; others are on their way to Austrian prisons; others—among them, Cæsar Cantu, the author of a History of the Reformation, which has just been translated into English—have saved themselves by flight. It is the peculiar feature of paternal Government, that it converts into enemies the most intellectual of its subjects. The event still hangs in the balance; but if the military force now in motion reaches Lombardy, the Liberal movement will inevitably be crushed. What is called "order and tranquillity" will be restored—that is, brute force will overpower all resistance, and the people will be reduced to silence. The bowed head with the curse at the heart, is the beau ideal of paternal rule.

King Ferdinand of Naples is less lucky. His island of Sicily has been misgoverned to a degree that has united all ranks of the people in one phalanx of rage and desperation. Nobles, priests, merchants, and peasantry, all join against the exactions and stupidity of the King's officials, who, sent from the mainland, have ruled Sicily like a province. They have nearly destroyed trade by protecting it, and loaded what was left by taxes, till, life becoming impossible with any sort of comfort, it only remained to try whether the risk of death in an insurrection was not preferable as giving a chance of amendment, if the revolt succeeded. The movement was better organised than most of these movements are with the Italians; a militia was armed in the rural districts, who marched into Palermo, eight thousand strong, to support the citizens when they had driven the Royal troops from the city into the citadel. More troops were sent over from Naples, but with no result. The King, not being used to such checks, had a fit, and was obliged to be bled. He swore, nevertheless, that he would sink Sicily into the sea rather than yield an inch, and sent his Royal brother, the Comte d'Aequilar, to see how things stood; the Duke, for a wonder, considering his relationship, was a man of common sense, and saw at a glance that the Royal cause was standing in a very queer and distracted posture; but he ordered a little more cannonading, just for the sake of appearances, and steamed back to Naples to tell his Majesty that really the game was up, and, whether he liked it or not, he must make concessions; the people had for once got the upper hand; and, with all the towns and cities in their possession, the troops penned into one fortress, disliking to have paving stones and boiling water thrown on their heads in the streets, it was useless to contest the point any longer. On this a Council was called; the King assisted as it in a furibund temper; but, his brother, the Ministry, prudence and necessity combined, carried the question.

His Majesty, after having shot as many of his subjects as possible, issued a Proclamation, wherein he states his resolution to agree to certain changes, out of regard "for the welfare of our well-beloved people." He says—"Our laws, the civil institutions, and the guarantees granted by our august predecessors contain every source of public prosperity; but, nevertheless, those civil institutions are susceptible of improvement, because such is the nature of human things." These Royal sources of "public prosperity" had somehow become strangely choked, but of that the ordonnance says nothing. The changes amount to this: the right of giving a "previous opinion" on all projects of law and public affairs generally, to the Consulta of Sicily; and, what is more important in the eyes of the people, a guarantee of perfect independence of the Government of the Island and its Judicial officers of the Court of Naples. In the act, ordonnance grants a complete "Repeal of the Union" between Naples and Sicily, leaving the King still its Sovereign, but destroying that "Neapolitan Ascendancy" party that had contrived to ruin one of the finest countries in the world. Sicily is henceforth for the Sicilians; no Neapolitans are henceforth to be appointed to offices there.

Now, had this been granted two months ago, it would, perhaps, have been received with something like thanks; but coming, as it does, from a King beaten and baffled, and who only grants this because, for the moment, he can refuse nothing, the concession is spurned. Why should the people accept less than they their power to take? The Sicilians insist on having their old Constitution restored; and, in this posture, with all the country in their power, the last accounts leave them. And, as Ferdinand of Austria is too busy on his own account to lend any aid to Ferdinand of Naples, and as Rome is no longer the ally of political stupidity, there is a good chance of the people succeeding. Moreover, they know the Bourbons too well to trust either their words, Constitutions, or oaths; none of the race would scruple a moment to break any or all of them, as soon as the peril under which they were given had passed.

There is a savage brutality in these paternal rulers, that renders any terms with them impossible. The very name of the King of Naples is of ill omen: Ferdinand of Spain hung the patriot leaders as soon as he could, after swearing to observe the Constitution; Ferdinand of Austria massacred the landed proprietors of Galicia, in a cool calculation of policy; his father Francis, buried in his hateful dungeons some of the finest intellects and gentlest hearts of Italy—men who, like Silvio Pellico, were treated worse than the blackest criminals. The same tyranny is going on at this moment, as virulently as if the world were still in the fifteenth century. Ferdinand of Naples has shed the blood of his subjects in Calabria and Palermo without remorse, and only ceases to do so because the people have made themselves the strongest. But the day of retribution seems at hand.

THE KING OF NAPLES.

FERDINAND CHARLES DE BOURBON, King of Naples and the Two Sicilies, who is at this moment engaged in a violent contest with his subjects, was born the 12th of January, 1810, and succeeded his father, Francis I., on the 8th of November, 1830. He has been twice married: first, to a Princess of Sardignia, who died in 1836; and secondly, to Marie Theresa, daughter of the Archduke Charles of Austria. He has children by both marriages.

King Ferdinand is a thorough resister of all innovations; the consequence is that he has all but lost the finest half of his kingdom. The concessions made by his late ordonnance are refused, as mere subterfuges; they give the people the appearance but not the reality of power; the successful insurgents insist on the restoration of the Constitution of 1812, granted when the English occupied the island. The Consultas, which it is the fashion of Italian sovereigns to grant in cases of emergency, are mere nullities; as bodies, they can only give an opinion on any measure—they cannot originate or carry one out. This the Sicilians spurn as insufficient; and it appears by the latest accounts that the Constitution demanded has been granted and proclaimed—a proof that the Royal cause had become desperate.

The King is the nephew of the Queen of the French; and his sister is the too celebrated Christina, Queen Dowager of Spain.

It is a curious fact that Louis Philippe, while residing in Sicily, assisted in drawing up the Constitution which has been so long abrogated and is now resumed.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

The Moniteur contains the following: "The Government has received a telegraphic despatch, dated the 28th of January, announcing that a trading vessel which arrived in the morning of that day at Port Vendres, brought information that the French war-steamer Gustor was destroyed by fire, and went down on the 23rd, at Porto di Campos, near Palma. The crew were saved. No account of that deplorable event had reached the Ministry of Marine."

The Chamber of Deputies resumed on Monday the discussion on the 8th paragraph of the Address, relative to the foreign relations of France. M. Thiers, in the course of his speech, proclaimed his sympathy for the Italian people, whose cause was that of humanity. He had never been a partisan of revolutionary Propaganda, he was averse to violence and perfidy; but, on the other hand, he was not blind. Every nation which conquered its liberty became a friend of France, and it was her interest to oppose all foreign intervention against a people struggling for independence. As respected the treaties of 1815, M. Thiers was sorry to tell his friends that they must be observed, because they were signed by France, and because they regulated by her relation with the rest of Europe, and were a guarantee of European peace.

The Chamber of Deputies resumed on Wednesday the discussion on the paragraph of the Address relative to Switzerland. M. Thiers, the first speaker announced that he would examine the question with all the moderation he could command, and he would have, he said, much merit in doing so, for no act of the Cabinet had filled him with more irritation than its conduct towards Switzerland. The Ministry viewed, in the triumph of the Swiss Government, the triumph of the Radicals, and the prelude of fresh disorders and anarchy. M. Thiers, on the contrary, saw in the present situation of Switzerland the revolution and the counter revolution; and the French Government, he was sorry to find, had espoused the cause of the latter. He then referred to the events accomplished in Switzerland during the last fifty years, and contended that the treaty of Vienna did not authorise the Powers of Europe, parties thereto, to interfere with the federal Pact. These Powers, in concluding that treaty, had merely wished to establish the neutrality of Switzerland, and ensure her territorial integrity. Austria alone asserted that Switzerland had not the right to modify the Pact without the consent of the Powers, and France had at all times entertained the contrary opinion. M. Thiers then proceeded to justify the aggressions committed by the majority of the Cantons against the minority, and stated that these intended not only to maintain the Jesuits but to impose them on the other Cantons of the Confederation; he then enumerated the various acquisitions of power, taxation and oppression, and described their conduct as perfectly legal, moral, and moderate.

A curious communication appears from Toulon, according to which Abd-el-Kader appealed to Marshal Bugeaud to see the treaty of surrender ratified. To which the Marshal replied that it could not be ratified; that the ex-Emir should make up his mind to choose a residence in France; but as all religions were tolerated, he added, characteristically, that he might build a little mosque.

The announcement in the Moniteur that the Russian Court would go into mourning for six days, for the late Princess Claude of Orleans, caused some sensation at the Palace, but the public seemed unaffected by it.

According to the returns of the operations of the Sinking Fund during the last quarter of 1847, the receipts realised in the quarter amounted to 343,600f., representing a capital of 8,626,749f.

The Memorial des Pyrenees, of the 28th ult., states that the Royal castle of Pau was being fitted up for the reception of the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, who were expected there in the month of May.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Joinville left Paris on Monday for Algiers.

There has just been uncovered in the usual sitting-room at the end of the library of the Chamber of Peers, a ceiling, painted by Henry Scheffer, representing Charles V., to whom France owes the foundation of her first library, standing in his royal robes, receiving the learned and scientific men of his kingdom, and inviting them to come and study in it for the benefit of his subjects.

ITALY

The affairs of Italy still stand forth on the face of European politics broadly and painfully conspicuous. In the Neapolitan dominions, the King, after in vain essaying the effects of brute force to stifle the just demands of his Sicilian subjects for a modification of the gross abuses of his tyrannical misrule, has at length, with a bad grace, yielded to fear what he denied to common sense and justice. During forty-eight hours the troops were masters of the city of Messina, and inflicted fearful horrors on the devoted city, but with no successful result. The atrocious measure did but confirm the brave citizens in their resolve never to submit to the tyrannical sway of such a Sovereign without obtaining some of those guarantees for good government, personal freedom, and security of the subject, which every constitutional and well-regulated Administration accords as a matter of course.

The report of the situation of Sicily presented by Count d'Aquila to the King his brother, on his return to Naples, produced a deep impression on his Majesty and the Government. Firmness and absolute confidence in measures of rigour had vanished before the reality of danger, which further resistance would inevitably produce. The King immediately convoked the Council of State. The Princes assisted at the sitting, which lasted the whole of the 18th, from nine o'clock in the morning to seven at night. After the deliberation a supplement of the official journal was published, containing a number of ordinances to the following effect. By the first, the Consulta of Naples, and that of Sicily, convoked in 1820, and from 1824, are invested with the following additional attributions:—1. Giving their opinion on all projects of laws and general regulations. Examining and giving their opinion on financial affairs, such as the budget, public debt, &c. 3. On treaties of commerce and tariffs. 4. On the petitions of provincial councils. The communes of Naples and Sicily shall possess administrative rights over their own funds, under the superintendence of the Government; and the General Consulta is ordered to present a project of law on the subject, on the basis of free election of the members of the Communal Councils by the assessors. decree, the judicial independence of each order of Neapolitan society is solemnly recognised. Employments in the Island of Sicily to be filled by Sicilians, and those in the kingdom of Naples by Neapolitans only; the administration of each to be separate and distinct, even to employé. This law to be promulgated six months actually filled promiscuously in the course of four months. By the third decree extraordinary consulteri are named, consisting of the heads of departments at Naples when the King's residence is there, and of those residing at Palermo when his Majesty resides on the other side of the Faro. By the fourth, Count d'Aquila, Prince of the Blood, is named Lieutenant-General of Sicily; his Excellency Minutolo, Prince of Canosa-prince; his Minister of the Interior; Foreign Affairs, Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works, the Duke of Montalbo; Director of Finance and Ecclesiastical Affairs, D. Giuseppe Ruongiovanni; Director of Grace and Justice, Giovanni Luca. A fifth decree, dated the 18th, confirms the liberty of the press in nearly the same measure as the other Italian States.

There has been also published a decree relative to an amnesty as follows:—"His Majesty, who always obeys the generous inspirations of his Royal heart, has deigned to ordain that the Ministers of Grace and Justice, and of the General Police of the kingdom, shall, within the shortest possible delay, submit to him the names of the political condemned and prisoners, in order that he may exercise his clemency. His Majesty desired, at the same time, that the measures best calculated to secure the tranquility should be adopted."

"All these decrees are signed by Marquis Pietracatella, the representative of moderate liberal opinions.

Several advices, however, it appears that the Palermitans, distrusting the professions of King Ferdinand, demand not securities for what is promised, but the Constitution which had been given for ages. The notorious offices of Castelcicala and Scherini, and the actual revolt which took place in the capital of the last mentioned province even supposing that the city of Palermo would remain quiescent not as a powerful diversion in favour of the Sicilians.

The events above detailed have led to the Proclamation of the Constitution of the Naples and Sicily, which took place at Naples on the 29th ult. It is to be observed that it is the Constitution of 1812, and not that of 1821, that has been proclaimed, and that it was prepared in Sicily under the auspices of English Government; and further, that his Majesty the King of the French, who decided there at the moment, actually assisted in framing it. This constitution vests in the establishment of two Chambers (Lords and Commons), and is framed from that of Great Britain. The Constitution of 1821, on the contrary, was more democratic, and contemplated one Chamber only. There is nothing in it, therefore, to shock the sensibility of any Constitutional Government. The French Government of the Restoration advised the King of Naples in 1821, to offer the Constitution of 1812 to his subjects.

From Milan we learn that, on receipt of orders from Vienna, recently received, the police immediately proceeded to arrest the Marquis Rosales, President of the Union Club; Count Cesar Battaglia, the young Marquis Sanchi Stampa, and several other inhabitants. Rosales is kept in close confinement in the frightful dungeon of Santa Margarita, and Battaglia and Sanchi were shut up in a postchaise, and sent out of Milan under a strong escort. Their destination is mystery, but it is supposed to be Gratz or Brunn. Among the other persons arrested figure Baron Bagatta, well known in the Parisian fashionable circles; Count Pertusati, and Count Ercolo Durini, former officer in the Austrian service. Cesar Cantu, a distinguished writer, and author of a "Universal History" translated into French; and Dr. Belcredi, who were also to have been arrested, succeeded in eluding the vigilance of the police, and crossing the frontier. The wife of the Marquis Filippo Villani waited on the Viceroy, and obtained from him the liberation of her husband; but, when she presented herself at the office of the Director of Police, Toresani, to claim the Marquis, he replied to her—"Let the Viceroy mind his own business."

The power of Austria to crush any popular movement attempted in the Lombardo-Venetian states has at no time been doubted, and hence the late enormous increase of her military force in the kingdom had occasioned surprise and apprehension. In Milan alone 30,000 troops are quartered; in Verona 10,000. The game of Austria is believed to have commenced. Conspiracies or demonstrations were brought about in the Milanese, to encourage a considerable number of nobles, of the upper classes, were arrested some time since. The time of the lower orders of discontented has now arrived, and upwards of 400 individuals, considered as the most turbulent, were lately apprehended. Of these 180 of the youngest and most robust were conveyed to Trieste to be employed on board the ships of the Imperial navy, and the 220 remaining have been transported, without even the form of a trial, to Styria and Moravia, where they are doomed to work as galley slaves. The regiment of Giulay, which acquired such a disgraceful notoriety in the massacre of Gallicia, was one of those quartered at Pavia.

A great number of copies of a pamphlet, entitled "The last events at Milan," have been circulated through that capital. It is an impartial account of the odious conduct of Austria. At Venice, in spite of the prohibition of the police, two ladies, named Bentivogli and Michiel made a collection for the wounded of Milan. 8000 francs have been already received, with a letter expressive of the sympathy of the Venetians for their Lombard brethren. The Podesta, or Mayor of Vicenzia has forwarded 2000 francs for the same object, in the name of the inhabitants. At Verona, in the course of eight hours, 1600 francs were collected. The police stopped the subscription, but did not seize the sum collected, which was sent to Milan. The Lombards are animated with a deadly hatred against Austria, and we can safely predict that the Gallicians shall be vanquished. On the 31st of January, three hundred of the most respectable inhabitants of Milan applied to the police for their passports. Everybody anticipates a "second Gallicia," and is anxious to quit the country.

The Concordia of Turin publishes the following letter, addressed by the Emperor of Austria to Archduke Rainer, Viceroy of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom:—"I have examined the events that occurred in Milan on the 2nd and 3rd instant. It is evident to me that a faction, desirous to destroy public order and tranquility, exists in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. I have already called for the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom all that you deemed necessary to satisfy the wants and wishes of the different provinces. I am not disposed to grant further concessions. Your Highness will make known my sentiments to the public. The attitude of the majority of the population of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, however, induces a hope that similar distressing scenes shall not again occur. At all events, I rely on the loyalty and courage of my troops." (Signed) FERDINAND I."

The King of Sardinia and the Grand Duke of Tuscany have respectively convoked, for the month of March, a Consulta of State, similar to that now assembled at Rome.

The Duke of Modena has quitted his estates, and no one knows where he is gone; some suppose to Milan, others say to Vienna! Two more Austrian battalions have entered Parma. The son of Prince Torella, escaped from prison at Naples, arrived on the 11th instant at Genoa.

SPAIN

General Espartero has written to the President of the Senate that family affairs would oblige him to proceed to Logrono.

The Fomento Barcelona journal, of the 24th ult., mentions that the Cabecilla Grinon, who assumed the title of Commander-General of the Maestrazgo, had made his submission, and was presented to Castro by Valentia.

The Fomento Barcelona journal, of the 22nd, announces the submission of the Carlist Chief Clements Brea, of Vich, and the flight into France of three other Cabecillas, named Rafel, Rosalcoma, who held the rank of Colonel, Cirlani and Carn.

According to latest advices from Madrid, the Moderado candidates had been returned deputies at Infantes, Montalvan, and Orgiva. The proceedings in the Congress were without interest. The discussion in the Senate had been suspended, in consequence of the number of orators who had given their names. The Political Chief of Madrid, with a view to allay the fears excited by exaggerated reports respecting the mortality in that capital, had thought proper to publish, in the Gazette a return, from the 15th to the 19th of January. The entire number was 547. M. Pacheco had returned from Rome.

GERMAN STATES.

The question of the liberty of the press in Germany will be brought shortly before the Diet, now sitting at Frankfort. A circular on the subject has been issued to the representatives of the Governments, requesting them to take the Governments of Baden, Bavaria, and Wurtemburg, will take the lead in the discussion.

The announcement of the decease of the King of Denmark had caused much excitement in the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, but public order had not been disturbed.

SWITZERLAND

[illegible] to the collective [illegible] Neuchatel for the Sth January, by the Envoys of three Austrian [illegible] Powers, [illegible] Switzerland, [illegible] protest. The Diet is firmly determined to maintain, by all the means in its power, the rights of Switzerland as a free and independent State. The new Envoys from Prussia, Austria, and Russia, have left Berne for Neuchatel on the 24th. His arrival has caused some sensation. The Committee charged with the question of revising the compact will soon commence its task; meanwhile, this question already occupies most of the Swiss journals. Several have already declared in favour of a system of two Chambers, that is, for the introduction into the Diet of a Swiss Chamber of Representatives, otherwise called Grand Council, sitting by the side of a Senate composed like the present Diet.

The new Constitution for the Canton of Schwyzt, proposed by the Government, was rejected by a general assembly of the people, held on the 23rd.

RUSSIA

The winter has not put a stop to the war in the Caucasus. The latest accounts from St. Petersburgh announce that General Freytag has been obliged to move forward with nine battalions, 480 Cossacks, and 16 pieces of ordnance, to engage in the mountaineers, and that it has been necessary to employ Congreve rockets to destroy two hamlets. In one of these encounters the Russians had eighteen officers and eight officers killed, with 148 soldiers wounded.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

Cape of Good Hope papers to the 10th December bring the intelligence of the safe arrival of Sir Harry Smith, the new Governor, and suite, in the Vernon, on the 1st of that month. Sir Harry at once proceeded to the Government House, where he was only installed into office. In the evening Cape Town was brilliantly illuminated.

Colonel Somerset had succeeded in effecting the passage of the Kye, an important post in the Kaffir war. The passage of the Kye has no difficulty had expected to have received shelter from Kreli, which, however, the latter refused; the former, therefore, recrossed the Kye. Information of that fact was immediately communicated to Captain M'Lean, the British Commissioner, and no doubt existed but Fato would either be captured by the British troops, who were in close pursuit of him, or that he would be compelled to surrender.

THE WEST INDIES

By the arrival, at Southampton, on Wednesday evening, of the Royal Mail Steam packet Company's ship Avon, R. S. Norton, commander, bringing the usual West India mails, we learn that a destructive fire had occurred at Charges (Central America) on the 7th of December, in which nearly all the houses in the town were burnt to the ground, including the Custom-house, containing 300 bales of cocoa. No lives were sacrificed.

Major-General Lambert, Commander of the Forces in the Island of Jamaica, had died.

The West Indian Islands were generally healthy, and the weather genial. The commercial advices brought by the Avon, which had made an unusually quick passage, not being due till the 7th inst., are of no great interest. The Jamaica markets remained in a very dull state.

The Avon brought on freight 268,276 dollars, 1017 oz. gold dust, and £150 in British coin, 4 srons of indigo, and a general cargo.

MEXICO

By the most recent advices from our Transatlantic neighbours which came by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company's ship Tweed, Lieutenant Philip Hast, R.N., commander, the only news of interest received is a confirmation of the agreement and negotiations with Mr. Trist, the American Commissioner, had been renewed, with some hopes of a pacific solution. It was also stated that so long as those hopes could be entertained, the army under General Scott would not extend its offensive operations.

Generals Paredes was lying indisposed at Talancingo, and Santa Anna living in retirement at Tehuacan. The army, as may be imagined, was nearly disorganised. The Mexican Government continued established at Queretaro.

INDIA

Advices, in anticipation of the overland mail, of the 1st of January, have been received. The dates are from Calcutta to the 23rd, Madras to the 24th December, and Bombay to the 1st of January.

A congratulatory address from the principal inhabitants of Calcutta had been presented to Lord Hardinge upon his return to the seat of Government. At a meeting previously held, with the view of obtaining a draught of the address, amendments proposed by several of the natives had been carried, acknowledging their sense of his Lordship's zeal in the cause of education and the arts of peace, as well as willingness to go to war when compelled to do so in defence of the empire, and it was to the latter points that Lord Hardinge principally alluded in his reply.

The Hon. Company's steamer Memnon, with the new Governor-General on board, touched at Aden on the 18th of December. Lord Dalhousie intended subsequently to pass a few days at Madras, and was expected to arrive in Calcutta early in January. Lord Hardinge would quit India a fortnight later, and, we are further informed, would make some stay at Aden, on his voyage home, to organise the arrangements brought about for the semi-annual overland mail. The fortress—he would then land at Cossair, from thence cross to Thebes, and descend the Nile.

The Governor of Bombay was on the point of departure for Scinde, intending to traverse the length of the province, from Kurrachie to Sukkur, upon a tour of inspection.

Late advices in the Delhi Gazette from Persia describe the condition of that kingdom as most disastrous. The Shah is said to possess but very insufficient means for resisting the rebellion in Khorassan and the simultaneous invasion of prefatory Turcoman chiefs.

The Bengal Government have taken definitive steps for carrying out experiments in several portions of the Bengal Presidency, and in the north-west provinces, for the growth of tea on a large scale. A grant of a lac of rupees per annum, to extend over a series of years, has been devoted to the undertaking, for which purpose has been committed the superintendence of Dr. Jameson, who is already occupied with the selection of sites for the plantations. This gentleman has already chosen several localities in the hill country west of the Sutlej. He proceeds shortly to Kangra, where a detachment is to accompany him across the Sutlej, and proceeded as far as Kangra, where a series of levels on a plateau, varying in altitude from 3000 to 4000 feet, offer, it is said, every probability for the successful cultivation of the plant. The Bengal Government has hitherto had been requested to despatch to India a number of Chinamen for the manufacture of the tea, and also seeds from the most celebrated districts.

The accounts from the Punjaub are to the same date as before, the progress of good government, and the continuance of tranquility.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met this day at five o'clock, by adjournment from the 20th of December last, and several petitions were presented.

NATIONAL DEFENCES.—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH asked whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Ministers to bring forward the question of the National Defences, on which subject he (the Noble Earl), had a notice of motion on the paper.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE was desirous to say that the subject would be first of all brought forward in the other House of Parliament.

Their Lordships then adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS. THURSDAY.

The House of Commons also resumed its sittings to-day after the Christmas recess.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.—The SPEAKER informed the House that he had received information from the Examiner of Petitions, that the recognizances of the petitioners, complaining of undue elections in the borough of Dundalk, Scarborough, the county of Monmouth, the city of Dublin, the counties of Longford and Sligo, had been found to be unobjectionable; that the petition complaining of undue election in the borough of Athlone, had been found to be unobjectionable. He also informed the House that the serious complaining of the petitioners in the boroughs of Penryhela, Hythe, and Stafford, had been withdrawn.

NOTICES OF MOTION. Sir W. SOMERVILLE gave notice that on Friday, the 11th instant, he should move for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—Lord J. RUSSELL said that it might, perhaps, be convenient for hon. members that he should state that it was his intention, either on the 14th or the 18th of the present month, to bring forward the financial statement; he could not state positively which would be the day, but he would give notice of that on a future day.

NAVIGATION LAWS.—Mr. HUME was anxious to know whether there would be any objection on the part of the Government to laying before the House a copy of the different statements on this subject that had been forwarded to the Government.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL did not think there was any documents of an official nature on the subject alluded to by the hon member that could be laid before the House. He had stated on a former occasion that he should take the opportunity of stating generally what had been done both by the present and former Governments in this country, and he begged now to state that he would, when he made his financial statement, of which he had given notice, bring forward that subject.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.—THE UNITED STATES. Mr. ROBINSON wished to know from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any correspondence had taken place between the Government of this country and the Government of the United States respecting the Navigation Laws; and, if so, whether he intended to lay copies of the correspondence on the table. (Hear, hear.)—Lord PALMERSTON.—Correspondence has taken place between the American Minister and myself on the subject to which the hon. member refers. The American Minister explained to me the principle on which the Government of the United States acted with reference to these laws, and stated that that Government would go hand in hand with the Government of this country with respect to any alteration which the Government of this country might deem advisable in those laws. (Cheers.) The answer I returned expressed the satisfaction which the Government had derived from the communication, at the same time stating that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to make a proposition to Parliament with respect to the Navigation Laws. I have no objection to lay copies of the communication before Parliament.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose for the purpose of obtaining leave to bring in four bills to facilitate the performance of the duties of Justices of the Peace. It was unnecessary for him to say how difficult for the magistrates to discharge their duties without being subject to many vexations actions. One of the present bills contained a provision for enabling magistrates to hold special sessions in populous districts at more frequent periods than they were at present held, by causing suitable buildings, when required, to be erected for the purpose, instead of holding their sessions, as they were now frequently compelled to do, in public-houses. The second bill was for facilitating the performance of the duties of the Justices of Peace out of sessions within England and Wales, with respect to persons charged with indictable offences. The third bill was one to facilitate the performance of the duties of Justices of Peace out of sessions within England and Wales, with respect to summary convictions and orders. The last of the measures was to make the whole subject complete, and was calculated to afford adequate protection to the magistrates in the discharge of their duties. Should the House agree with him upon the principle of the measures, and afford them a second reading, he should be quite content to allow the next session to intervene before they proceeded to further consider upon the bills. The subject was a very large one; and, although the present measure might not be perfect, still he thought that it was a step in the right direction.—Leave was then given to bring in the bills, which were read a first time.

WEST INDIES.—Lord G. BENTINCK then rose, pursuant to notice, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the present condition and prospects of the interest connected with and dependent on the sugar cane, and into the grievances of the West Indian planters, and concluded his statement by moving for the Committee.—On the part of the Government, it was stated that the appointment of a committee was unnecessary, as the Government had already before them the evidence on the subject, which would be carefully considered by them, and from which no doubt could be entertained that the present Free Trade measures would be rescinded.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in his reply, quoted a variety of authorities to prove that the state of distress complained of in the West Indies was greatly improved.

At twelve o'clock the debate was adjourned.

SANATORY REFORM.—At an inquest held on Friday (last week), at the Mariners, South Hackney, the Coroner, Mr. W. Baker, inquired if any steps had been taken to destroy the nuisance complained of by a piece of stagnant water in the neighbourhood, from which two children in one family had recently died? Mr. Clarke, surgeon, said about fifty letters had passed between the guardians and the landed proprietors of the property. Nothing had been done, owing to a bankruptcy, and a disputed liability.

COLONEL HALL has undertaken the triangulation and levelling of the metropolis, under the superintendence of the Sanatory Commissioners. The Sappers and Miners have already constructed for themselves a sort of crow's-nest on one of the towers of Westminster Abbey. They have made another point of elevation on the summit of the cupola of St. Luke's, Chelsea.

ABOLITION OF THE PALACE COURT. A meeting of the legal profession was lately held, having for its object the abolition of the Palace Court. This Court is one of peculiar jurisdiction. There are two Courts—the Marshalsea Court and the Palace Court. The former Court has exclusive jurisdiction in matters connected with the royal household, and its origin is lost in the records of the ancient monarchy. The Palace Court was created by letters patent in the reign of Charles II., and has a jurisdiction of twelve miles; its business is confined to six attorneys and four barristers. At the meeting of the legal profession the Palace Court was denounced as a "legal monopoly," and the question was whether an application should be made to Parliament for its immediate abolition, or whether the profession should wait for the decision of the Judges on the writs of certiorari granted by the Court of London, in which the question raised was, whether the Lord Mayor's Court by the Act 6 and 7 Vic., c. 73 (Attorneys and Solicitors) was thrown open to barristers? The latter course was expected to be adopted in a few days. The meeting resolved to await the decision of the Court of Error. Should, however, the Palace Court be thrown open by the decision, the public will be in no better position than at the present moment—whether six or six thousand attorneys practice therein is a matter of indifference—the question is whether the Court, with its machinery, cannot be made available in a somewhat similar manner to the City Small Debts Court. The members of the legal profession complain that there is no graduated scale of costs. The jurisdiction of the new County Courts extends to £20, and attorneys would be satisfied if for sums above £5 some costs were allowed. It is understood that the suitors of the Palace Court will, in a short time, be brought before Parliament.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

JUDGMENT IN THE CASE OF DR. HAMPDEN.

Judgment in this case was delivered on Tuesday morning. The Court, the passages, and the gallery were densely crowded, under the greatest anxiety manifested by the Bar and the public to be present when the judgement was delivered. The Bishop of Llandaff, Lord Monteagle, and Lord Campbell, had seats provided for them on the Bench.

The Judges entered the Court at five minutes past ten o'clock.

Mr. Justice Erle was the first to deliver his judgment. He said that this was a motion for a rule for a mandamus to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to hear and decide the points urged by the applicants against the confirmation of Dr. Hampden, founded upon unsoundness of theological opinions entertained by him. In support of the mandamus, it had been argued, under the statute 25 Henry VIII. chap 20, it was the province of the Archbishop to try judicially the election of the person presented, and that the objectors had a right to state their objections, and to demand the judgment of the Archbishop; and that that right might be enforced by mandamus; and that the terms of the statute are not in contradiction to that being done. Upon a review of the statute, which he stated was not very clear, it appeared to him that the power of nominating was given to the King, and the Archbishop had no power to judge whether the person nominated was a proper person or not; and, if he refused to confirm that person within twenty days, he was liable to certain pains and penalties. In the case before the Court it was not contended that the Archbishop could exercise any power to interfere with the King's nomination. If he should be unable to confirm from the infirmities of nature, or the like causes, it was not likely that the penal law should be sued out against him, but the power to do so still remained, notwithstanding, in the King. In the case of the Dean and Chapter electing the person named in the letters missive, the King commanded the Archbishop to confirm, and they must consider whether this was a peremptory command to confirm, or a command to inquire into and try the qualifications of the person elected. According to the general rule, the words of the statute should be construed so as to give effect to the statute. Now, applying that mode of construction to the terms of the statute, it did not appear to him that the statute gave the Archbishop authority to hear objectors. Whether the law was satisfactory or not was not the question. The inquiry was as to what the law was, and not what it ought to be. The object of the statute, it was said, was to guard against the interference of the Pope in the business of Confirmation, but the statute not only did this but it also declared the rights of the King. After giving his best attention to the arguments which had been addressed to the Court, he was clear in coming to the conclusion that the right of hearing the objectors did not exist, and that the rule for a mandamus should be discharged.

Mr Justice Coleridge then delivered a most elaborate and learned written judgment, which occupied an hour and a half in reading. After stating that the shortness of the time given for the consideration of the case had prevented him from entering into so full an examination of all the arguments and authorities as he could have wished, he said he regretted this, as he was compelled to differ from his brother Erle and the Lord Chief Justice. He thought they were bound to throw aside the consideration of the inconvenience which it had been alleged would attend the agitation of this question; that inconvenience had been somewhat exaggerated; but it was not all on one side. His Lordship then continued: "For myself, I am disposed to forget consequences, which affect the mind to powerfully, and to regard the question merely as one of law. I rest my judgment on this narrow ground, that the applicants have laid such grounds before the Court as entitle them to a mandamus, in order that it may be demurred to, or be made absolute. My opinion is, that the Court is not capable of an inferior court with a question before it for decision, with parties lawfully summoned to appear, and with sufficient interest in the matter to entitle them to be heard. If that be true, it is within the province of this Court to compel the inferior court to allow those parties to appear, and to hear their allegations it is no answer to this to say that the court is an ecclesiastical court: for the ecclesiastical courts are not withdrawn from the control of writs of mandamus or prohibition. We cannot divert the course of their proceeding, nor review their decisions by way of appeal. They are to form their own judgments. But still we shall compel the ecclesiastical courts to address themselves to the decision of their duty, and restrain them when they show that they are about to exceed their jurisdiction."

Having established, by reference to authorities, the power of the Court in such cases, he said:

"I come now to the statute of Henry VIII; and here our object is to ascertain, not what Henry VIII. intended, but what was intended by the Legislature. If the former could be ascertained, I apprehend it would not be unfavourable to my view. But it is not quid voluit lex, but quid dixit Parliamentum into which lawyers must inquire. The fifth section of the statute enacts, that the king shall signify the election of the Bishop elect to the Archbishop of the province, and require him to confirm the election; and the question is, what is the import of the word "confirm?" It is said that the duty and function of the Archbishop was ministerial. On the other hand, it is contended that Confirmation was a substantive judicial act, and that the Archbishop was to perform that act according to the accustomed forms. It is obvious that those who take this view must take upon themselves a large burden of proof. It is necessary for the appellants to examine the whole of the statute, and to show that no fallacies can be drawn from it contradictory to their view; and it was necessary, with the same object, to examine what was, in point of fact, done at the time of and since the passing of the Act. But it must be borne in mind that usage cannot contradict it, nor can disuse render it obsolete."

The examination of the statute may be ranged under four heads of inquiry, three of which the counsel for the appellants had failed to bring under the view of the statute. On each of them so strong a case was made, that no answer could be given to those who contended that the Confirmation was a solemn judicial act. Having stated many arguments founded on Canon Law on the one hand, which had been received into the Law of England, and defined from the same authorities the meaning of the term of Confirmation, his Lordship said:

"But I cannot hold that a solemn, public, judicial act, after a rough hand, freed us from the vexatious interference of Rome, at the same time intended that we should wear a yoke upon our necks, and that our Archbishops should be liable to these penalties, if, in the unwelcome duty, they refused to perform the act which firm the election of a Bishop who might be disqualified for that sacred office. I cannot believe that Henry VIII. so intended, who gloried personally in the title of Defender of the Faith. At the same time, in Ireland and the colonies, the Crown exercises this power of nomination without confirmation; but it is obvious that the retrival in Ireland of the statute of Edward VI., which had rendered Confirmation unnecessary, and was non-existent in this country, shows that we have the same forms as existed before the Reformation, and from early ages The Archbishop is not the only person concerned, for the Bishop elect has also an interest, of which the Canon Law takes notice, otherwise he could not [illegible] his election. The Queen of Rome. The forms established by usage become binding, and all we know how to do is by forms that rights become substantially protected. For more than three hundred years these forms have taken the same shape in open Court, and according to that proceeding the Archbishop is bound now in process. It has been urged that there has been a total want of the exercise of this right since the Reformation; but the judge by the evidence of a satisfactory manner. Considering all the circumstances which are to be taken into account, which I have endeavored imperfectly to express, it seems to me that this rule ought to be made absolute.

Mr Justice Patteson fully agreed that the general Canons of the Christian Church established satisfactorily that, wherever Bishops were elected, Confirmation was an act of ecclesiastical supremacy, and was a judicial and not a ministerial act, and which required examination into the process of the election and the qualifications of the person elected. It was said there was no instance of an Archbishop having exercised a veto on the appointment of the Crown. But it appears that, for some time after the passing of the statute, witnesses were examined and regular inquiries were made, though in more modern times they have not taken place. The disuse of a power or authority will not destroy that authority. If Confirmation is a ministerial and not a judicial act, a solemn mockery has been gone through; but if it is a judicial act the parties are entitled to appear and make their objections. The forms given in Gibson have all the appearance of a judicial proceeding; and if it is not so, it is all a mockery and deception. The Church Discipline Act has been referred to; but that is an application for the parties to be allowed to appear, to show that the Bishop is not to be confirmed for some objections to his doctrine. I have great doubts as to the power of this Court to grant a mandamus under the circumstances which my hand has fluctuated upon this subject, both during the argument and during the delivery of the judgment of my brother Erle. Formerly, the decree of this Court was final, but now its judgment may be reviewed by a Court of Error. Now, by refusing the writ, we prevent the party from appealing against our decision; whereas, if we grant the writ, it will only lead to a fuller consideration, and more satisfactory determination of this question. I think, therefore, they wrought to grant the writ, unless our minds are quite clear that the applicants have not the right which they claim. I am aware of the evil connected with the agitation of men's minds upon this subject, and the delay which has been proposed, but that is not a sufficient reason for refusing the writ. I have also alluded to the nature of the objections to be urged; for the mistake has been in refusing to admit the parties to appear and state their objections, whether they might be. Upon these objections the Archbishop or his Vicar-General is to determine, and this Court will not interfere with their decision. Upon the whole, I think this rule must be made absolute.

Lord Denman having stated the grounds of the application, said:—

"I have no doubt that, in this case, the mandamus ought not to issue; and, even if I were at all in doubt on the subject, I should think it better not to issue the writ, than to run the risk of abridging the clear and established prerogative of the Crown in a matter of such vital importance, still more to the best interests of the people than of the Crown itself. I admit that there has been established a grand fame case of wrong, where, after every reason for persons to appear in opposition, and after proclamation to the contrary, persons so appearing were prohibited from stating the grounds of their opposition. The proceedings by which opposers were invited to appear, and then had their mouths stopped at the very outset, and were excluded the court [illegible] fleted no honour on those who instituted the form. It is an absurdity, [illegible] grounded by the further proceeding of declaring those very persons contumacious for non-appearance, who had actually appeared, and, claiming to be heard, were not heard. That these things are anomalies there can be no doubt: but they do not constitute a case for setting aside a clear and established rule, founded on a distinct Act of Parliament, and settled by invariable practice.

He denied the necessity of an inquiry into the faith and doctrine of a Bishop when the person to be confirmed has already been ordained a Deacon; on whose occasion all people have been called upon to pronounce whether they suspect him of any crime or offence, when, if anything was alleged against him, formal proceedings were deferred until enquiry should be made? The same person must have undergone the same ordeal on being ordained a priest; and, when bishop-elect, he comes with the additional testimony of parties well qualified to judge of his fitness in all respects for, since the provisions of that statute, he brings the recommendation of the Crown—and is that to pass for nothing? Why is the Archbishop, then, to commence an inquiry? Why is he to call upon all the world to come forward and oppose? If the election were left to the people, I could understand the argument; but here it has passed away from the people, and been vested for ages in the Dean and Chapter, on the recommendation of the Crown. The consecration, therefore, is said to be like the election, very little more than a formal ceremony. The one is the initiation of the Dean and Chapter, and the other the Confirmation of the Archbishop: but both are, in reality, acts of the Sovereign granted, that being so, we are now asked to find some reason why Confirmation should be more than a mere form also

He regretted that the Canon Law formed no part of the Common Law of the realm, unless practice can be shown to the contrary, and enlarged on the inconveniences that would arise if objections were allowed to be heard on every Confirmation of a Bishop.

"The duty of the Archbishop in the matter appears to me to be clear, and entirely apart from the functions of a Judge. It is, in my opinion, more analogous to the duty of a returning officer at elections. His Confirmation is merely ministerial. If his enquiries lead him to the opinion that the appointment would be pernicious, he can remonstrate. He can advise the Crown not to issue a congé d'elire. He may ask to be removed from the painful position of performing, or ordering to be performed, the duty of consecration after the election has been made. Even then he may still resort to the presence of the Sovereign, and pray to have the congé d'elire and the letters missive superseded. But even at the worst, if the Crown persists in nominating the person to be Bishop, and if he is quite clear that the congé d'elire ought to be set aside, he may set at his consequences which would arise from the issuing of such a writ, viz., the frightful state of theological animosity which it would create and perpetuate for a period of, perhaps, two years, and the sanction it would give, upon the usefulness of every see, to the adoption of a similar course, where the Archbishop would be called on to summon all mankind in every case as objectors to the appointment of the Crown, and keep open a Court, which, in fact, might never be closed. I must acknowledge that some deference is due to the exalted person who is the defendant in this case, as well as to Dr. Hampden himself, whilst more regard is to be paid to the safety of the Church and the peace of the realm. I certainly believe would be purified by the encouragement of the smallest doubt as to the true meaning and intention of the Act of Henry VIII. I repeat that I have the greatest respect for the opinions of my learned brethren. I think this is a question which ought to have been discussed. The balance of convenience certainly appears to me to be in favour of discussion. I must say, in reference to my brother Coleridge's admirable argument, that it only confirms me in the danger of exposing the clear construction of Acts of Parliament to those who would bring down their forgotten books, and wipe off in this Court the cobwebs from decretals and canons, of which they know nothing. For these reasons, and thinking myself bound by the Act of Parliament, and the practice which has prevailed, I think the rule must be discharged

The Court being equally divided in opinion, the application was refused, and the rule was accordingly discharged.

Rule discharged.

WESTMINSTER COUNTY COURT

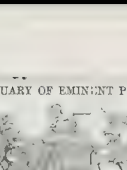
LORD V. VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, M.P.—On Tuesday no action was brought by the plaintiff against Lord Palmerston, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs for work and labour done. The Judge (Moylan), on the case being called, inquired of the professional gentlemen present in Court, if any one attended for the Lord(s), and received an answer in the negative. He then proceeded to the Court to call Lord Palmerston in the outer Court. This the officer did, to the astonishment of the numerous suitors, who wondered what weighty business could bring her Majesty's Secretary for Foreign Affairs to such a place as a district County Court. No answer being given to the three repeated summons of the bailiff for his Lordship to appear, the plaintiff stated the sum he sued for was for work and labour done in repairing wheels for his carriage during the years 1842 and 1843. Judge: Who employed you to do the work? Plaintiff: I had the orders direct from his Lordship's own mouth, at his residence in Cadogan-gardens. It was in the early part of 1842 that his Lordship gave the order for one portion of the work, and I am positive that it was in his library, in Carlton-terrace, and not in Great Stanhope-street. The Judge: But how can you be compelled to his Lordship for payment? Plaintiff: Oh, yes, your honour, a good many times, but I never had a chance of seeing his Lordship. I have written to him, and sent in two or three bills, but I have never had an answer. The Judge, seeing quality of the plaintiff's claim in the plaintiff's books, made an order upon his Lordship to pay the debt and costs on the 16th inst.

THE TYPHUS FEVER AT PRAGUE.—We learn from Prague that great mortality has been caused there by typhus fever. The ravages by this disease have increased. The deaths to an extent out of all proportion to the usual average. From the 15th of December, 1846, to the 15th of December, 1847, the deaths amounted to 5192, being one in twenty-three of the population.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE AMERICANS.—The state of the streets is incredible. You see only filth and the corpses of the unburied poor lying here only the shouts and ravings of the drunken soldiers, or the groans of ill wounded and dying. Any place is open for the rapacity of the Yankee soldiers: shops and private houses are entered, and robbed alike of all that is portable and worth taking. Many acts of retaliation are, of course, not wanting; and single soldiers, drunk or sober, at unseasonable hours, or at night, fall victims to the hatred of the Mexican leperos. No respectable person leaves his house after dark; the streets are deserted by all but the evil-doers above mentioned, and occasionally a band of Yankees prowling for some purpose or another a testimony of their admiration for his barbarous valour by that such and the worst kind of street music. The very soldiers who form the patrols appointed to keep order in the streets, take advantage of their position and under pretence of searching for arms, break into houses, particularly in the more distant part of the city, and commit every kind of atrocity. General Scott gives himself the trouble to write long orders, which are published, but in such barbarous English that no one can understand them, and those for whom they are intended are obliged to guess at their meaning. We have here eight generals, each of whom has taken possession of a private house, and all its contents, thrust out the proprietors, who may find shelter where they can, and many of whom have been put to excessive inconveniences, and in these houses they live, eat and drink, and sleep, but no furniture, and no judge by the awful quantity of dirt in the senses, convert them into pigsties, for a blind man, if he had the use of his nose, might point out every one of the houses occupied by the Yankee Generals and other officers. The Commander-in-Chief's one exception. All of a sudden, more or less, gluttons. They consume an enormous quantity of food, particularly of fruit, even in the streets. They are rarely seen without a full mouth; and this quality must appear particularly disgusting to the abstemious Mexicans. Their conception of the administration of justice is perfectly barbarous. Most offences are punished by flogging. A Frenchman and a Swiss, who had been found in a house, were taken up by the patrol, but were sent on the way to the guard-house by Cornet Harvey, the nephew of General Harvey, who had the prisoners conveyed to his house, and there treated to fifty lashes each on their bare backs. The sufferers immediately lodged a complaint against the cornet for illegally inflicting punishment on them, but no notice was taken of the affair, and a few days later the cornet left the city with the convoy for Vera Cruz without let or hindrance. Some ten days ago I met several carts in the village of Tacubaya, to one of which an unhappy wretch was tied by the hands, so that the points of his toes could barely reach the ground. The road goes rapidly down hill, and the miserable creature was compelled to run full trot. His hands were almost black, and I could hear his groans above the echo of the wheels on the rough stones for a long distance. A Mexican has been publicly exposed in the market-place of the capital for three successive Mondays, a Yankee General commanding at the operation, which was conducted with considerable military pomp. Sights, indeed, have yet seen of American morals and manners is almost enough to every [illegible] being. The very Generals under the command of General Scott [illegible] the license he gives Generals Pillow and Worth. Men of reputation, and much esteemed, have been placed under arrest for insubordination and want of respect towards General Scott, and it was said that they would be brought to trial; but they made a counter subject, and the delay which has occurred, and we are led to believe that his reign here will be short. He evidently does all he can to drive the Mexicans to desperation, believing that by that means he will force them to unconditional submission, and be enabled to dictate an onerous and peace-maker before his countrymen, claiming, as a reward, the Presidentship, the object of his ambition. I do not believe that even by these desperate means he will obtain his end, for the people have become more and more [illegible] The municipal authorities, which are here elected every year, have been reinstated under the protectorate of the American army in that portion of the Republic occupied by it: the elections will take place in a few days, and I shall send with them to the movement to which I alluded above. Means have been taken to represent the conduct of General Scott in a proper light at Washington and New York, and agents will be sent there immediately, to promote the free annexation of this country to the great northern Republic. May Heaven prosper this last effort to save this country! It is a sad means, but the only one left to us, as the puncture; and as this party has a large number of the more civilised American officers on their side—if not actively, at least as well-wishers [illegible] we must hope that they may succeed. On the 6th, a body of 400 Americans entered the capital, if possible, more dirty, ragged, and savage than the previous importation. They call themselves. Los Voyageurs de Texas. Once more I say, Heaven preserve this country from such horrors! —Correspondent of the London Telegraph.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED

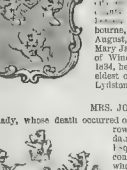


THE COUNTESS OF BEVERLEY.

LOUISA HARCOURT, Countess of Beverley, died on the 31st ult., at the family mansion in Portman-square. Her Ladyship was third daughter of the late Hon. James Archibald Stuart Wortley Mackenzie, and sister of the late Lord Wharncliffe. She was born 4th October, 1781, and married 23d June, 1801, George Percy, present Earl of Beverley, by whom she leaves surviving three sons, and two daughter.

SIR ROBERT WILLIAM NEWMAN, BART

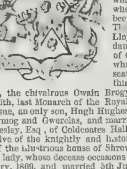
SIR ROBERT died, a few days since, at his beautiful seat of Mamhead, in the county of Devon His family has been established at Dartmouth for several centuries, and may be traced in the public records of that town so far back as the reigns of Henry VI. and Henry VII. The worthy Baronet, who sat in Parliament at one time for the city of Exeter, and served as High Sheriff of the county of Devon, in 1827, obtained his title of honour from the Whig Government of Lord Melbourne, in 1836. He was born at Oporto, 18th August, 1776, and married 21st September, 1814, Mary Jane, third daughter of Richard Dennie, Esq., of Winchelsea, by whom, who died 28th July, 1834, he leaves four sons and four daughters of the eldest of the former being the present Sir Robert Lydston Newman, Bart., of Mamhead.



MRS. JOHN HUGHES.

THIS lady, whose death occurred on the 27th ult., at her residence, Cleveland-row, St. James's, was the eldest surviving daughter of the late Richard Hughes Lloyd, Esq., of Plymog, county Denbigh, Gwercilas, county Merioneth; and Bachall, county York, whose male ancestors, sons of Rhys ap Griffith, whence sprung the Royal house of Tudor. [illegible] married Dorothea, daughter and heiress of Hugh Hughes, Esq., of Gwercilas, baron of Kymmer-yn-Edeirnion, whose progenitors had been uninterruptedly seated at Kymmer, from the demise in the thirteenth century of their immediate ancestor, the chivalrous Owain Brogyntyn, Lord of Edeirnion, son of Madocap Meredith, last Monarch of the Royal Dynasty of Powys. Of this marriage there was issue, an only son, Hugh Hughes Lloyd, Esq., who succeeded to the estates of Plymog and Gwercilas, and married Margaret, daughter and heir of Richard Walmesley, Esq., of Coldcoates Hall, county Lancaster, and of Bashall, representative of the knightly and historic family of Talbot and Bashall, the senior line of the illustrious house of Shrewsbury

The lady, whose decease occasions these few remarks, was born at Gwercilas, 3d January, 1800, and married 5th July, 1832, her relative John Hughes, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-law, youngest son of the late William Hughes, Esq., of Pen-y-Clawdd, representative in the male line of the Hughes of Gwercilas, by whom she leaves an only child, Talbot de Bashall Hughes, born in 1836. Mrs. Hughes's interment in the family vault, in Gayton church, North amptonshire, took place on the 3d inst.



SIR GEORGE K. A. MOLYNEUX, BART

SIR George King Alderson Molyneux, Bart., of Castle Dillon, county Armagh, died a few days since He was son of the late Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Molyneux, Bart, and grandson of the Right Honourable Sir Capel Molyneux, Bart., M.P. for the University of Dublin, by Elizabeth, his second wife, only daughter of Lieut.-General Alderson, commanding in the East Indies. Born 17th October, 1813, he married 6th July, 1837, Miss Emma Green, and leaves issue one surviving son, now Sir Capel Molyneux, Bart., and two daughters, Elizabeth and Emily Catherine

The Castle Dillon family is an offshoot of the ancient stock of Molyneux of Sefton. It is incredible, springing from immediate stock from Sir Thomas Molyneux, who commanded the forces of Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, when he defeated and slain by the combined insurgent Lords at Radcot Bridge, near Farringdon, in 1388 Daniel Molyneux, Esq., M.P., son and heir of Capel Molyneux, in the same kingdom, was appointed, in 1686, Ulster King of Arms. ## NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD. We understand that Vice-Admiral the Earl of Dundonald, G.C.B., the newly appointed Commander-in-Chief to the West India station, has applied to the Lords of the Treasury for his arrears of half-pay, which, were suspended during the period his Lordship's name was not on the Navy List. The noble and gallant Earl has been restored to the same rank and position in the navy to which he would progressively have arrived had his name not been removed, appears to have a strong prima facie ground for such application. London Morning Herald.

MILITARY INSUBORDINATION IN INDIA.—The general orders of the Commander-in-Chief in India record three more courts-martial on European soldiers for the offence, apparently a prevalent one, of striking their officers in the execution of his duty. The crimes of which the men were tried, however, were all committed a few days prior to the Meerut executions. As regards punishment, extreme rashness would seem to have succeeded extreme severity. A few weeks ago a man was shot for throwing his cap at a commissioned officer: we now see a private sentenced to but two years' imprisonment for throwing his musket and drawing and throwing his bayonet against a sergeant; while another, a corporal of her Majesty's 98th, convicted of drunkenness, of beating and kicking and drawing his bayonet against a couple of sergeants, and of violently resisting the men of the guard when attempting to take him into custody, is simply punished with reduction to the rank and pay of a private—the Commander-in-Chief remitting corporal punishment, which the Court had awarded him, on the ground of "previous very good character." In the first case, the Court originally adjudged the culprit to 14 years' transportation; but a revision of the sentence was directed, when two years' imprisonment was awarded. We cannot perceive, in the brief official notice of the proceedings, the slightest ground for this exercise of lenity. The case seems to have been a very bad one; infinitely worse than at least one of those punished with the extreme penalty of the law. From the nature of the recent sentences, however, we suspect that transportation is intended to be resorted to as seldom as possible, and that imprisonment with solitary confinement, and the much dreaded lash, are now considered the most appropriate and effectual punishments for insubordinate conduct. —Bombay Telegraph.

CHRISTIAN VIII., KING OF DENMARK.

Christian VIII., the late King of Denmark, Duke of Sleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg, &c., died, at Copenhagen, on the 20th inst., in the sixty-second year of his age, and the ninth of his reign, having succeeded his cousin, Frederick VI., on the 3d of December, 1839. He was born September 18, 1786, married a second time May 22, 1815, to Caroline Amelia, of Sleswig-Holstein-Souderburg-Augustenburg, born June 18, 1796, now surviving Queen Dowager, with whom he had no issue; but of his first marriage was born, October 6, 1808, Frederick Carl Christian, now actually proclaimed King of Denmark, who ascends the throne as Frederick VII.

During his short reign of eight years, Christian VIII. had the satisfaction of seeing Denmark prospering, and rapidly increasing its internal resources. The finances have improved, as well as agriculture and commerce; and all branches of industry, as well as the arts and sciences, of which this accomplished King was the great protector. His unusual abilities, excellent intentions, and gentlemanly manners, would, no doubt, have secured the deceased King the best affections of the Danish people, if he had not unfortunately clung to the old-fashioned principles of that absolute Government which he inherited with the Ministers of his predecessor, and had not sufficient courage to throw aside, although repeatedly urged by the prayers of the people, who could never forget that he had been instrumental in preparing for Norway its excellent Constitution. Had he acted with courage and decision in establishing a responsible Government, instead of advocating slow reforms, it is most likely that the unfortunate dissensions with the Duchies would not have arrived at the extreme point of bitterness now existing.

Two hours before his death the late King was still in full enjoyment of his faculties. He had, during the day, two conversations with his son, and has left him, in his own handwriting, instructions full of wisdom. Prince Frederick proceeded, at seven in the evening, to his chateau of Christanburg, the etiquette not permitting the successor to the Throne to pass through the city before his being proclaimed. At midnight, the new King signed, in the Council of Ministers, the proclamation destined to announce his accession to the Throne. In it he declared that he would continue the work of his father, and that he would inaugurate his reign by giving to the country new institutions, which had been, for a year before, prepared by the direction of the late King. These political concessions may gain for the new King some degree of popularity; but, at present, he is not much liked by the people, on account of his personal character, of which many most unkingly anecdotes are in circulation. He is divorced from his second wife, a Princess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and has no children. The presumptive heir to the Throne, therefore, is his uncle, Prince Frederick, now nearly sixty years of age, and also childless. After him, should the present King not marry again, the Crown would pass to Prince Frederick, eldest son of the Landgravine of Hesse, eldest sister to the late King. It is this Prince who married the Grand Duchess, daughter of the Emperor Nicholas, who died three years back. His accession will lead to a forced solution of the question of the separation of Holstein from the Crown of Denmark, a question raised at the end of 1846, by a rescript of King Christian VIII., and which has so much agitated men's minds in the Duchies and in Germany. The Duchy, being wholly German, wishes to be separated from the Danish Monarchy, and become, under the Duke of Augustenburg, a part of the Confederation. It was the expressed determination of the late King to keep the succession of the Duchy of Holstein in the female line; against this resolve the Duchy itself has protested.

The question of this succession is a most difficult one; nothing is more intricate than German genealogies, and these are complicated in the present case, by the terms of old charters and constitutions. It has been observed by an able writer, that "The provincial animosities which still prevail in the Danish dominions are the legacy bequeathed to the sturdy inhabitants of those countries by their ancestors, who were constantly engaged in provincial wars. In the last half of the 17th century appeals were frequently made to England by the rival chiefs of these cognate houses, and with our mediation and advice the Royal branch of Denmark succeeded by more than a century of negotiation, sometimes backed by force of arms, in consolidating its authority over the whole of the peninsula and the isles. Unfortunately, this difficult task was not further secured by a legislative union of the provinces. The Crown of Denmark retained, and still retains, in the ancient kingdom, the absolute rights established by the Revolution of 1660; whilst in the Duchies the estates of those provinces are still in the enjoyment of their ancient freedom of debate. Hence a local majority has been allowed to maintain its ground, and carry resolutions which affect in reality the entire interests of the monarchy. The only remedy for this evil is the establishment of a more uniform and complete representation of the whole Danish people. An act of settlement for the entire monarchy can only be passed by the representatives of the entire nation. The united estates of all the Danish dominions are evidently the sole competent authority, and, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, they would naturally exercise the same species of elective right which was assumed by the British Parliament when it called the descendants of the Electress Sophia to the throne."

THE LATE KING OF DENMARK, CHRISTIAN VIII.

COPENHAGEN.

The Illustration (from an original Sketch) shows the metropolis of the kingdom of Denmark, one of the finest capitals in Europe. Its aspect, on emerging from the narrow entrance into the port, which is capable of containing five hundred merchant vessels, besides the whole navy, is very grand. In our Artist's view, the principal buildings of the Old Town, the New Town, and Christianshaven, are distinctly shown. Next to the Harbour we have the Observatory, and the Churches of St. Peter, the Virgin Mary, and St. Nicholas; the Royal Palace of Christianburg, one of the finest buildings in Europe; the Church of the Trinity; and the Exchange, in the New Town; St. Saviour's Church, in Christianshaven, the noblest Church in Copenhagen, with its singular tower, 288 feet high.

DENMARK

King Frederick VII. has commenced his reign by an act of clemency, which augurs well for his Majesty's constitutional spirit. By a Royal rescript, dated the 24th ult., his Majesty has been graciously pleased to decree that all proceedings now pending in any of the Courts of the kingdom for political offences, or for the violation of the laws which regulate the press, shall be at once cancelled and annulled.

It is needless to add, that the publication of this rescript has been received with joy by his Majesty's faithful subjects, and that measures of reform are confidently expected, which will at once unite the component parts of the kingdom, and establish the Throne on a firm constitutional basis. On the forenoon of the 23rd the Magistrates of Copenhagen were admitted to an audience by his Majesty on the occasion of his accession to the Throne, and the Chief President, Lange, addressed his Majesty in a long speech, the gist of which was that the faithful capital had perfect reliance and confidence, from the letters patent of the 21st of January, that the King, well acquainted with the hops and expectations of the people, had resolved to carry out the improvements begun by his predecessor.

To this speech his Majesty was pleased to reply: "I thank you for your sympathy in the great affliction which has befallen me and my country, and which nobody can feel more deeply than I do. I have already expressed, in my letters patent to my subjects, that it shall be my first and most anxious endeavour to follow the example of my departed father, and especially to carry out that arrangement of State affairs which he was in the act of putting into execution when he was laid upon his bed of death. In that letter I have briefly declared my intentions; and, as truly shall I keep my Royal word, so truly, so confidently, do I rely that my people will await in reliance on their King for the resolution which I shall take in these important matters.

"Mr. President, be assured that I am graciously and affectionately disposed towards you and the city of Copenhagen."

The Kjobenhaven's Post contains the following address from several hundred citizens, chiefly consisting of students and mechanics, to the representatives of the burgher class and deputies of the States:—"We, the undersigned burgesses and inhabitants of Copenhagen, hereby call upon the states, deputies and the representatives of the burghers of the capital, to adopt measures conformable with the importance of present circumstances, and as the organ of the people to seize the right moment for bringing before his Majesty the wishes of the people."

At the taking of the oath of allegiance by the students at Copenhagen, on the 22nd, there was, according to the Kiel Correspondenz Blatts, a loud exclamation of "The Constitution for ever!" Many of the students and candidates joined in this cry.

New Era in Steam Navigation.—In the Washington Union, of January 5, is a long report from a board of professional engineers and others, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to test an important improvement in the construction of naval steam-engines, the invention of Capt. Ericsson. There appears to be an apparatus called an evaporator, and another a condenser, conveniently arranged amidst the machinery so as to occupy very little space. By this, the steam, after performing its work, is converted into water, and forced back into the boiler—again and again taking the same routine. As some of the steam will always be lost by loose joints, the evaporator supplies the deficiency from the element in which the vessel floats, and from this increased supply of steam the condenser affords any desired amount of fresh water. The whole is said to be complete and perfect, and the following results attained:—1. A steamer may go to sea, and complete her voyage, without ever having one particle of salt water in her boiler, if she will begin it with fresh water. 2. She need not carry any tanks of fresh water, but can make it from the sea at will; thus saving the space for fuel. 3. Besides the supply for the boiler and culinary purposes, enough fresh water can be made to allow each sailor a bath every day, the supply may be so ample. 4. The fires need never be extinguished to relieve the boilers of salt or mud, as neither salt nor mud will ever get in; thus saving fuel. 5. The boiler will require little or no watching; being once arranged, the machinery will do the rest, and keep up the exact supply of pure water. 6. A boiler at sea, especially in the Gulf of Mexico, will last two or three times as long as at present, as no impurities will be admitted there, any more than on the lakes. 7. Nearly one-fifth of the fuel will be saved, as the heat will act on the plates and flues, free of incrustations from salt or mud, and the water from the condenser, while very hot, will be pumped into the boiler. A low-pressure engine will answer on the Mississippi and Missouri, as well as on streams of clear water; as the muddy water will be evaporated, the vapour recondensed, and forced into the boilers as clear as crystal. 9. The awful bursting of boilers, so often occurring on the western waters, may be arrested in toto, as the saving of fuel, and the equal adaptation of the low-pressure engine, will induce its substitution in lieu of the powder magazines, as the engines now in use may be called. 10. The fit used around the piston of the cylinder, and the rust on the boiler, may impart a little of their taste at first to the steam and water; but a very simple filter will make it as pure as when distilled in the chemist's laboratory. Should these results be obtained, it must be admitted that the invention will reflect credit not only on Captain Ericsson and the Secretary, who has developed its advantages by his experiment and adoption, but on our country, and prove most advantageous to all who are interested in steam navigation.

Loss of the Steamer "Scotia."—On the morning of the 15th, the Scotia was observed lying in the Bay of Stora, much deeper in the water than customary; consequently, as there was no one on board, Captain Williams, of the schooner Rhoda, lying at anchor close by, lowered his boat, and went on board, accompanied by a portion of his crew, when to his surprise he found that the water had risen so as to cover the machinery, and that it was fast increasing, which he imagined must have been occasioned by a material damage from a French brig which parted from her anchors and went foul of her on the night of the 13th inst. Captain Williams did not leave the Scotia until the arrival of Captain Pereira, which took place shortly, when a consultation was held as to the expediency of running her on shore, in order, if possible, to save a wreck of the ill-fated ship, which was done by the sole exertions of the Rhoda's crew and three or four of the Scotia's men. She was speedily run on the sandy beach, and immediately parted asunder. On the following day, a large portion of her wood work was sold by auction on the spot. The boilers and parts of her engines were observed peering over the troubled waves, and will no doubt be ultimately recovered.—Malta Times, Jan. 25.

THE UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION MUSEUM.—NEW ROOM.

THE UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION MUSEUM, WHITEHALL YARD.

Among the "gratuitous" Exhibitions of the metropolis, the Museum of the United Service Institution takes a prominent position, for the great number and variety of the interesting objects assembled within its walls. The suite of rooms comprises a very fine Armoury, arranged under the superintendence of Mr. George Stacey, of the Ordnance Department, Tower; a very spacious Model Room; and a large Collection of Antiquities and Ethnological Rarities. There are also attached to the Institution, a Lecture Theatre, Library, &c. The Establishment is supported by entrance-fees and annual subscriptions; the members having the privilege of introducing visitors, without charge, to inspect the Museum. There were upwards of 4000 Members in March last; and in the year 1846, the number of visitors was 32,185. For three days at Easter and Christmas, and on the anniversaries of the Battles of Waterloo and Trafalgar, the Museum is thrown open to the public; and on these occasions, in one day, upwards of 6000 persons have availed themselves of the privilege.

The Museum has just received a very interesting addition to its attraction by the munificence of Mrs. Watson, the widow of Mr. Thomas Watson, late of the Long Room, Custom House. Mrs. Watson has presented to the Institution upwards of 32 large Paintings of Battles, and other Memorable Events in Naval History; besides several Models of Vessels, and a Marble Bust of Mr. Watson, who died in 1845. For their reception, a large apartment has been handsomely fitted up, entirely at the expense of the liberal donor. The bust is placed at the extreme right hand corner of the room: it is by Mr. Towne, the ingenious Modeller to Guy's Hospital. The Models are principally of Ships. In the centre of the room is placed the large Model of Linz and its entrenched camp on the Danube, with a few other Models belonging to the Institution.

Upon the crimson-papered walls hang the Pictures: they were painted by Mr. Butterworth, an artist whom Mr. Watson maintained in his house while he executed the commission. Among these Pictures are Lord Exmouth's Attack on Algiers; the Battle of Trafalgar; the Loss of the Royal George; Loss of the Kent East India ship; Lord St. Vincent's Action, in 1797; Men of War after the Battle of Trafalgar; Loss of the Ogle Castle Indiaman, on the Goodwin Sands; and the Loss of the Blenheim, 74 guns, &c. &c.

The Museum is constantly being enriched by interesting gifts. In the room with Mrs. Watson's pictures, &c., are three Models, lately presented by the Duke of Northumberland. In the principal lower room is a large and splendid Model of a Line-of-Battle Ship, of the Hanseatic League, of the year 1650; taken out of the Arsenal at Hamburg in 1804, and presented to the institution by Captain Sir John Marshall, R.N. It is richly carved and gilt from head to stern. The Topographical Models, illustrating the systems of fortification, are attractive just now, when the epidemic of the day is "Our National Defences." There is a host of Chinese Curiosities, not forgetting the wooden cage for a human prisoner. There are some oddities of costume, as the first uniform worn in the Navy; and a hat which belonged to Lord Nelson, is encased in glass. In the Council Room, by the courtesy of the Secretary, we were shown a fine large Orrery, made for King George the Third, and figured in Ferguson's "Astronomy."

H. M. S. MÆANDER.

GEORGE WILSON, ESQ.

The Anti-Corn-Law League has become quite historical, its task was done when Sir R. Peel virtually abolished the Corn Laws, and as an active confederation it ceased its efforts to move the public mind. But its leaders had gained too firm a hold on general attention to sink at once to obscurity; those of them who were not in Parliament before the change they had helped to bring about, were placed there by the last election. It is only in consequence of his declining to enter the House that Mr. George Wilson is not an M.P. For several years he was the Chairman of the League, and it was principally to his great talents for business and practical ability that its perfect organisation was to be attributed. The division of labour was well understood by the members of the League; and each acted in that sphere for which his qualities best fitted him. There was never an instance of so many men acting together for one purpose, for so long a period, in such complete harmony, as that presented by the League. No jealousies or petty quarrels, which have often broken up Cabinets, disturbed the good understanding that prevailed among them. As Chairman of this body, Mr. Wilson presided at most of the great meetings held at Covent-garden. On these occasions he generally confined himself to short, clear, and simple statements of the progress the question had made, leaving arguments to be elaborated by the orators of the night. From what may be called the dissolution of the League, Mr. Wilson has appeared but little in public till the great demonstration made last week at Manchester to meet Mr. Cobden, and celebrate the return to Parliament of those gentlemen who had been members of the League. He then presided over a meeting of above three thousand persons. It was to this assembly that Mr. Cobden delivered the speech which is now subjecting him to the abuse of his old opponents, met by very cold support from some of his friends.

H. M. S. "MÆANDER."

On Tuesday evening, this fine ship, 44, Captain the Hon. H. Keppel, sailed from Portsmouth for the East Indies, having on board Mr. Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, and suite. The Meander will proceed to the Cape of Good Hope direct, en route to Singapore and Borneo, taking the latest news from England to the former place, and dispatches from the Government.

The Meander is a very handsome looking vessel, and is fitted with all the very latest improvements incidental to active service. During her stay at Spithead she was riding at single anchor, and experienced some very heavy weather. Owing to the paucity of anchors in the Dockyard on Porter's plan, she was supplied only on the eve of her departure from Sheerness. This author having inconsiderably demanded of the Admiralty by an officer of Captain Keppel's experience, speaks highly in its favour.

The Meander takes takes out the following personages:—Mr Brooke, Rajah of Sarawak; Mr. William Napier, Lieutenant-Governor of the Island of Labuan; Mrs Napier. Miss Napier, the two children; Mr St. John, private secretary to Mr. Brooke; Mr. Low, Government Secretary to the island of Labuan; Mr Scott, Licutenant and Surveyor of Public Works to the island; Lieut. Hoskins, R.N., Postmaster of Labuan; Mr Gwynne, Postmaster of Hong Kong, who goes out in the ward room; Lieut. Paton (son of Sir H. Paton), of the 58th Regiment, quartered at Calcutta, as the guest of Captain Keppel; and the Hon. Granville Keyston, naval cadet, to join the Vernon, 50, flag-ship on the East India and China station. The Rajah was most hospitably received by the Commander in-Chief, who invited the following distinguished party to meet his Highness:—Mrs Ogle, the Hon Mrs Keppel, Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane, C.B.; Rear-Admiral Prevost, C.B.; Captain Mundy, R.N.; Captain the Hon. H. Keppel, R.N.; Mr. Napier, Mr. St. John, Flag-Lieutenant Cochran, and Captain Ogle, R.N.

On Thursday week, the Meander was officially visited by the Lords of the Admiralty. The Hon. Henry Keppel received the party at the gangway, and escorted them over his fine ship, with those curious and minute details of efficiency that Lordships could not be otherwise than satisfied. Their Lordships witnessed the getting out, manning, and pulling of the barge and pinnace with which the Meander had been supplied, and the Lord John Hay's plan. These boats were pulled round the ship several times, and, notwithstanding there was at the time a very heavy sea running, the boats exhibited first-class qualities; they were quick to handle and steer, easy to pull, dry as possible, and very swift withal. Captain Keppel provided a superb collation for his illustrious guests, of which they partook. At a quarter to three they left the ship under a salute of nineteen guns.

A very beautiful lithograph of the Meander has just been executed in tint, by Mr. Thomas G. Dutton, appropriately dedicated to Mr. Brooke. The noble ship is cleverly drawn, and the accessories of the picture, the various craft, &c., are equally successful.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1848

Parliament opened on Thursday: the freshness of the interest generally excited by the commencement of the Legislative Session has, however, been exhausted by the short preliminary sitting, in which two great questions were temporarily disposed of, if not finally settled. The Committee appointed on Commercial Embarrassments and Currency, acts as a breakwater against the further agitation of the last of those subjects in the House, which is thus left with more time to apply to questions less abstract. But there is no fear of a failure of occupation; there never was an instance of a Legislature being brought together without business springing up for it in most unforeseen directions. The first difficulty that must be grappled with by the Ministry, is the Protectionist movement in favour of the West Indian interest, headed by Lord George Bentinck. In spite of the rumours of his party having deposed him from the leadership, on account of certain Liberal tendencies where corn and sugar are not concerned, he must still remain the most prominent man of that section of the Opposition. There are some kinds of influence of which a man cannot be deprived except by his own act. Unless Lord George Bentinck gives up the cause, the cause is not at present able to give up him; he is industrious and intrepid, qualities from the value of which the hand of success scarcely detracts. Finance comes next: Sir C. Wood, with the invariable bad luck of Whig Chancellors of the Exchequer, has to come before Parliament with a deficit, and the unwelcome question as to the ways and means of filling it. Along with this not unusual phenomenon, comes a demand for increased expenditure. The invasion fever seems to have had the effect of reconciling the public to a greater outlay of money on military preparations, as a necessity; but we apprehend our expenditure under this head will not be very largely increased at once. An addition to the Artillery, and a calling out of the Militia to the number of ten thousand men each year, are said to be the extent of the martial preparations we are to make for the reception of the Prince de Joinville. Under the double difficulty of too little revenue in hand, and multiplied means of spending it, it is obvious that we may bid a long farewell to all hopes of that dream of the heavily burdened—a reduction of taxation. The Tea Duties are vainly represented to the polite, but somewhat frigid Premier, as unequal, oppressive, and everything that a tax always is when people wish to get rid of it. "The answer is as ready as the borrower's cap;" we can't spare the money. To the bold-bits of the Window Tax the same reply is given; and there is a decisive, cold unanswerability about the plea of poverty, which disarms opposition. As less taxation is impossible, and as more money is wanted, it remains to enquire what new impost is to be laid on, or what old one is to be increased. Two and two is not always four in finance; for doubling the per centage of a tax does not produce twice the former revenue from it. These are the problems with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to meet the Parliament of 1848.

The Free-Trade press has almost without exception deserted Mr. Cobden on the Invasion Question. The journals seem to be scared by the boldness of a civilian daring to differ with the greatest military authority of the age; and ideas which are yet novel are never received without extraordinary opposition. Discussion will make many things stranger than Mr. Cobden's ideas of the intercourse of nations, familiar to us by-and-by; at present the two parties are under many misconceptions. A century ago war was considered almost the natural state of things; young gentlemen made a "campaign in Flanders," for improvement in manners and morals (it may be presumed), as regularly as they now steam up the Rhine with a tutor. Frederick the Great rather disturbed this dilettanti state of things, and furnished history with some real battles, whence amateur soldiership fell to a discount. But pedantry is strong, and the interval between Frederick and Napoleon produced some degree of forgetfulness; it was the Corsican who showed the world what war is on the grand scale; his main purpose was to beat the enemy, he did not care how. Battles now became murderous affairs, and campaigns were shortened to as many days as they lasted months under the old system. Dilettanti warfare is no longer possible. War is expensive, and most of the States of Europe are in debt. Invasions are not so easily undertaken as some suppose: what has Russia been doing all these years in the Caucasus? Surely, any one who sees the enormous difficulties in the way of aggression, may, without having a shout of execration raised against him, doubt whether a war armament in time of peace is necessary; and, as to the alleged attack Mr. Cobden is said to have made on the Navy, it only amounts to this, that our force is not distributed according to the ends for which it is said to be kept up. We are told, the Navy is intended to protect our commerce, and no ships are sent where our trade is greatest; that is the fault of the Government and the Admiralty; it is absurd to suppose that Mr. Cobden made the stationing the ships a charge against the Commanders, who have nothing to do with it. As to the preference for good stations and fine climates, no one who knows anything of the Navy at all can doubt that they are objects of preference and "interest." The coast of Africa is shunned as eagerly as the Mediterranean is sought. The long periods a ship remains in harbour at Lisbon, Malta, and other favoured places, is a matter of joke in the Navy itself. Did the reader never hear the facetiæ legend of the frigate that was anchored so long in the Tagus that she went aground on the beef bones thrown overboard from the dinners of the crew? The truth is, our fleet is dispersed about the world to favour political intrigues, not to protect commerce; and it is the absurdity of our trying to tell all the world how they are to govern themselves that Mr. Cobden wishes to expose.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—A very good attendance this afternoon, and a fair amount of business transacted on the Chester Cup, at improving prices. The "select" were Cracow (one of the Danebury string, and a tremendous "pot,") Swiss Boy, War Eagle, Lady Hylda, Rufus, and the Herman Plateoff colt. Nothing of particular interest presented itself in the Derby betting; still, as showing the feeling of the market, we should mention that Assault and Cervus were backed in good quarters, and that Kerauu and Sesostris, notwithstanding a liberal outlay, lost ground. Springy Jack was not taken of.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is most seriously indisposed, and bulletins of the state of his Grace's health are daily issued from the Palace at Lambeth.

The Bishop of Manchester. The completing ceremony, that of Installation, which will take place in the Collegiate Church, Manchester, is fixed for Saturday week, the 12th instant. The short interval will not allow of the construction of a stall or throne for the Prelate, in harmony with the exquisite workmanship of the existing stalls, which are carved from the oak of Boscobel wood. Temporary erection. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners are in treaty for Sedgeley, near the New Bury Road, about four miles from the Exchange, and within the parish of Prestwich, for the residence of the Bishop.

Head-Mastership of Birmingham Free Grammar School.—Birmingham, Wednesday.—The Governors of King Edward the Sixth's School met on Wednesday, to elect a head master, in succession to Dr. Jeune, now Master of Manchester. There were seventeen candidates, but of these the claims of only three—the Rev. S. S. Regnard, M.A., Senior Assistant-Master of Westminster School; the Rev. E. L. Gifford, M.A., Second Master of the Grammar School; and the Rev. G. E. L. Cotton, M.A., one of the Masters of Rugby School were submitted to the ballot. Mr. Gifford was declared duly elected.

A great sensation in the Church has been caused among the clergy of Chichester diocese by the refusal of the Bishop to ordain a gentleman on account of his declared adherence to Puseyism.

Tenterden Church.—The Rev. C. Greene, the rector, states that the south aisle of this edifice "has been most liberally restored at the sole expense of the family of the late Mrs. Smith." The church, at the beginning of this year, was one of the poorest in the diocese; the only portions of Gothic stone visible in the whole structure consisted of three windows in a dilapidated condition, whereas it now contains seventeen windows, six arches, western doorway, &c., of this material. The nave has been lengthened to the north side for the school children erected, the church entirely repaired, repaved and repewed, with new oak reading desk and pulpit and the chancel entirely restored.

Peterborough Cathedral.—According to a thorough cleaning; men have been employed scraping the bases of the columns, cleaning the walls, repairing the arches, and restoring the ornaments defaced by time. The organ is also about to be improved by the addition of double diapason stops under the organ-builder.

Greyfoore Church, which for the antiquity of its architecture, and the various ancient monuments which it contains, has been surpassed by any country church in the diocese of Carlisle, has of late undergone many material alterations and improvements, and the chancel is now being wholly rebuilt, in accordance with a condition advanced from the Bishop, with the united concurrence of the Patron, Rector, Churchwardens, and parishioners.

Christ Church, Surrey.—A few days since, the trustees of Mr. Marshall's estates assembled for the purpose of electing a Rector of Christ Church, Surrey, rendered vacant by the death of the Rev. Mr. Mapleton. The Rev. T. M'Gill, B.A., Curate of Clapham, and the Rev. G. W. Lewis, M.A., Minister of St. Peter, Southwark, were nominated; and the votes of the Trustees were found to be—in favour of Mr M'Gill, 8; and in favour of Mr. Lewis, 5. Neither party would give way; and as it was found impossible, under the circumstances, to proceed to the election, it was agreed that the matter should be referred to the Bishop of Winchester, and that his decision should be final. A statement of the case was laid before his Lordship, who forthwith appointed Mr. Lewis to the benefice.

The Lord Bishop of Carlisle has instituted the Rev. William Wilkin, M.A., of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, to the Rectory of Boote, Cumberland. The Rev. gentleman commenced his ministerial labours in his new benefice on Sunday last.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. FRIDAY

The LORD CHANCELLOR took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock, when the Bishop of Bath and Wells took the oaths and subscribed the Parliamentary Roll. Lord Abinger also took the oaths.

Lord BEAUMONT presented a petition from the society called the Odd Fellows Manchester Unity Society, consisting of 260,000 members belonging to 4000 lodges, and receiving £340,000 per annum for charitable purposes, praying that they might be placed by legislation under the Benefit Societies' Act. They had a surplus in hand of upwards of £600,000, and would be greatly benefited if they could place it in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt for safety.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

Mr. MORRIS rose, and addressed the House at considerable length. The Hon. gentleman having entered fully into the subject in support of the principles of Free Trade, was followed by

Mr. T. BARING, who took the opposite or Protectionist view; and was succeeded successively by Mr. BERNAL, Mr. BAGSHAW, and Mr. D'ISRAELI, the latter gentleman, as much length, contending for the principles of Protection

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

BANNS V. LINDO.—On Thursday this case came before the Court upon a demurrer to one of the pleas in an action which has been for some time pending. Mr. Dundas was support of the plaintiff's case, and the plaintiff was the manager of Drury-Lane Theatre, and the action was brought upon an agreement which was set out in the declaration. By it the defendant had engaged to sing twenty times at Drury-Lane Theatre, either between the 8th of June and the 21st of July, 1845, or between the 30th of September and the 15th of November of the same year. The defendant was to choose either of those two periods, but her choice was to be made before the 31st of March. The plaintiff, on his part, engaged to pay the defendant twenty sums of 50 louisd'ors each. The declaration then alleged that both of those periods had elapsed, and that though the plaintiff had been ready and willing to perform his part of the agreement, yet the defendant did not engage her to sing at or during either of the said periods. The defendant was discharged from the engagement by the said agreement. The earned counsel said, that here the defendant had had an opportunity of doing one of two things: to sing for twenty nights during either of two periods; and having neglected to give notice of her choice, she failed to sing during the second period, after having failed to sing during the first.—Lord Denman: I think the plea cannot be supported. The defendant engaged to come and sing: judgment must be given for the plaintiff on this plea, unless counsel can suggest anything to the contrary.—Judgment for the plaintiff

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—FRIDAY.

THE MURDER IN GOLDEN-LANE, ST. LUKE'S.—Hannah Parker (aged 38), was indicted for the wilful murder of Amina Davis, and of Robert Blake. The facts of the case have been recently published, showing that the wretched prisoner murdered the children to be revenged for a supposed want of herself by their father Blake. Evidence of the crime having been adduced Mr. Baron Alderson summed up, and the jury returned a verdict of Guilty; whereupon his Lordship immediately passed upon her sentence of death, intimating that she could not possibly expect any mitigation of punishment in this world.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—A bulletin to the following effect was issued yesterday (Friday) morning:—"His Grace was not so well yesterday afternoon, but after some hours of tranquil sleep is less exhausted this morning (Signed) Robert Ferguson, M.D.; J. Callendell, surgeon. Lambeth Palace, Feb. 4, 1848."

MURDER OF A SOLDIER IN ST. JAMES'S-PARK.—Last night, a young man, named Henry Tucker, a private in the Coldstream Guards, was shot in St. James's-park, by a soldier of the 3rd Regiment, named Annette Meyer, a servant, in a fit of jealousy. The poor fellow was shot through the head, and expired immediately after. The woman was taken into custody.

COUNTRY NEWS.

REPEAL OF THE WINDOW-TAX.—A meeting was held on Monday at the Guild-

hall, Bath, over which the Mayor (Mr. W. Hunt) presided, for the purpose of passing resolutions for the repeal of the tax upon windows, and for the petitioning the Legislature. The meeting was well attended. There were present, besides other influential persons, Lord Duncan, M.P., and Lord Ashley, M.P., both of whom addressed the meeting at considerable length on the subject of the resolutions, and expressed their concurrence in the view taken by those present as to the repeal of the tax. The Mayor, having explained the objects for which the meeting was convened, the Rev. J. Newell, Admiral Gordon, Mr. T. Barrett, Mr. Green, Mr. C. Bidwell, and other gentlemen moved and seconded the resolutions, which were adopted unanimously, and the meeting broke up.

THE Postmaster-General has issued an order that, on and after Wednesday last, a mail-bag is to be despatched from the Birmingham Post-office, at 11h 40m. A.M. daily (except on Sundays), to London, with letters for London and for places which circulate through London, but that such letters are to be forwarded in this bag unless prepaid by stamps. The letters despatched by this mail will not be delivered the same evening in the metropolis, but foreign letters will be forwarded through it, by which means a post will be saved. It has also been considered that an extension of the free delivery of letters in the Bristol-road district, Edgbaston, shall take place in accordance with the request in the memorial presented to the Post-office authorities some time since.

THE UNEMPLOYED IN GLASGOW.—A contemporary of Tuesday estimates the unemployed operatives, male and female, including labourers, in this city and suburbs, at 15,000. As far as we can learn, this is a near approximation to the number: and when the factory-workers on short time are taken into account, we must look upon the present as a very trying season to the industrious classes in this quarter. At the meeting held on Tuesday at Paisley, for the purpose of devising means for the relief of the poor of that town. The last return by the Paisley Relief Committee showed that upwards of 6000, including dependants, were receiving relief, while more applicants were pressing to be put upon the roll. The Committee, besides, is already upwards of £1000 in debt. In Kilmarnock, Greenock, and other towns, matters are not much better.—Dissent Chronicle

AN INFERNAL MACHINE AT SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield Iris states, that early yesterday morning week an attempt was made to blow up the premises of Mr. Marples, joiner and cabinet-maker, Norfolk-street, by means of a machine similar to others used in that town for like diabolical objects.

NEWSPAPER OFFICE BURNT.—On Thursday night the printing-office of the Ipswich Express was entirely burnt out by fire.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—While the family of a gentleman named Preston, of No. 33, Bugle-street, Southampton, was at church on Sunday evening last, between the hours of six and nine o'clock, some daring thief or thieves entered the house, and stole therefrom a fire-proof box, about eighteen inches long, No. 19,891, containing title deeds and other deeds, various bills or notes, a box of trinkets, containing a large cornelian gold seal, amber mounted, and a gold bracelet to match, gold pins, rings, and other articles; a silver gilt watch by Macklin, of London; twelve silver tablespoons, ten dessert silver spoons, seventeen silver teaspoons, eight silver saltspoons, two silver gravy spoons, six silver forks, six small silver fish-knives, and a tin cash-box containing two sovereigns. Some of the plate was marked with the initials "M. P.," or "J. M. P.," others with a crest (a griffin). No clue has as yet been discovered likely to lead to the detection of the robbers.

TWO MEN SUFFOCATED AT A BREWERY.—An inquest was held on Friday (last week), on view of the bodies of William Clark, aged thirty-eight years, and Richard Sims, aged forty-three years, who were found suffocated in a vat, in the brewery of Messrs. Abbott and Co., at Bow. On Tuesday evening they received orders to clean out one of the vats, which contains about 300 barrels, preparatory to its being filled with ale. One of the witnesses saw them about four o'clock, and when he returned in an hour afterwards he could not find them. Clarke's candle was burning on the top of the vat. There is an aperture on the top, and it is usual, before they descend, to place a candle to the hole, and if it is blown out the vat is full of foul air; but if it still burns, the vat is considered quite safe. Witness placed the candle to the aperture, and it went out, and then he knew the men in the vat were quite suffocated, and he instantly called for assistance. Two ropes were procured, and witness was lowered, and found the two men lying at the bottom of the vat. They were immediately drawn up, and life was found to be quite extinct. Mr. Abbott said the men generally received their orders as to the state of the vats before they commenced cleaning them, and thought that Sims, who had been in his service five weeks, had entered the vat first, and been overpowered by the air, and Clark also following, they had both fallen to the bottom of the vat, suffocated. Clark had been in their employ five years, and was well acquainted with the danger. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death;" and they recommended to Messrs. Abbott and Co. the propriety of exhibiting proper instructions in some conspicuous place, to prevent future accidents of the like nature.

Her Majesty, on the Queen's Private Secretary coming to Court, received a report of the pony phaetons and four, attended by Colonel Buckley and the Honourable Captain Gordon, Equerry and Groom in Waiting. His Royal Highness inspected his stud stables, before they returned to the Castle. Prince Charles's sheep were ordered out during the day, but they were speedily sent back to kennel, in consequence of there still being too much frost upon the ground. There were no arrivals at the Castle; and the only guest at the Royal table in the evening were the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay and Dr. Mey

PRINCE ALEXANDER OF THE NETHERLANDS. THE Grand Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg Gotha are expected to arrive at Windsor Castle on Sunday or Monday next, on a visit to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

FOR some time past, the works on her Majesty's estate in the Isle of Wight have been rapidly progressing. The old mansion, known hitherto as Osborne House, has, since the departure of the Court, been taken down, and a new edifice of the former building remains. The ground has been excavated and prepared for the foundation of what will be the front elevation; and we learn that his Royal Highness Prince Albert, personally accompanied by her Majesty, will pay a short visit next week for the purpose of laying the foundation stone

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

A MEETING of the Royal Commission, to inquire into the Merchant Seamen's Fund, sat at the Board of Trade, on Monday, for three hours and a half The Commissioners present were—Lord Ellenborough, Sir W. Clay, Sir E. Codrington, and Mr. Bickersteth. George Scovell, Esq., and G. F. Young, Esq., examined

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—At the weekly meeting on Friday (last week), invaluable and interesting inventions were exhibited in the model-room, of which the following is a short description. The Ventimometer.—This Instrument was invented by a French naval officer in high command at the port of La Rochelle, where it has been tried during more than three years. It foretells the changes that take place in the electro-magnetic currents, so that during the twenty-four hours, exceeding any period of observation the wind indicated by its needle will certainly blow, the change generally taking place between twelve and eighteen hours. The instrument is not acted upon by the light breezes, but by any strong wind, and the inclination of the needle indicates the velocity of such winds up to violent tempests. The principle was explained by Mr. Schmidt, who will be happy to show the instrument to any scientific gentleman. Should its predictions prove accurate, the instrument cannot fail to be of the highest importance to our commercial marine, as not only regulating the departure, but also the navigation, of vessels

BENEVOLENT BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION. On Monday evening a meeting of the committee and members of the above institution, formed for giving relief and granting pensions to deceased members of the various branches of the building trade, their widows and orphans, and also to afford relief to workmen in case of sickness, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the transaction of general business. Mr. George Bird occupied the chair. The report read by the secretary was very satisfactory The routine business of the evening having been gone through, thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting broke up

SCOTTISH HOSPITAL.—SINGULAR BEQUEST.—On Tuesday, a special general meeting of the Governors of this Corporation was held at the Scottish Hospital Office, Crane-court, Fleet-street, for the purpose of considering whether the Society should accept of the somewhat singular bequest of a gentleman named Rose, and whether a benefit society should be founded in connexion with the institution. Mr. B. B. Cabbell, M.P., in the chair. The Secretary, Major Adair, read a letter from a relative of the gentleman above-named, and who is still living, informing the Governors of the following clause in his will. The two houses, Nos. 12 and 13, Queen-square, Westminster, will shortly revert to Mr. Ross; and after that event takes place, and after his decease, his executors are to pay over to the credit of the Trustees of the Hospital the sum of £100 per annum until the amount reaches £1000 by principal and interest. The interest of that sum is then to be expended towards the board, clothing, and lodging, but not the education of fifteen boys, to be qualified to participate in its benefits, must be of the name of Ross, and natives either of the counties of Ross or Sutherland. In addition to this, the terms of the bequest, pointed in letters one inch in length, were to be kept on a board in the hall of the Scottish Hospital, which board was to be kept in repair at the expense of the Governors. The Governors were also to keep the vault in which the remains of Mr. Ross were interred in repair, and also to keep the iron railings round it in proper order and condition. In the event of these conditions being violated, the money was to be paid over towards the maintenance of the Seamen's Hospital on board the Grampus, off Greenwich. Considerable discussion then arose as to the propriety of accepting such a bequest, as their solicitor expressed his opinion that the trust would be a very hazardous one to the governors. After much debate, pro and con, it was agreed that the solicitor should take the opinion of counsel upon the matter The governors then proceeded to consider whether it would be advisable or not to found a benefit society in connection with the institution, to enable members of it to take any of the following benefits in any degree that might suit them, within certain defined limits:—A sick allowance, a sum payable to his heirs at death, and a deferred annuity. It was strongly objected that the terms of their Act of Parliament would not admit such a foundation, and, after much discussion on the subject, it was decided that the matter should be referred to a select committee, five to form a quorum.

A CABINET COUNCIL was held at half-past two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, at the residence of Lord John Russell in Chesham-place. The Ministers present were Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Campbell, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Sir John Hobhouse, Viscount Morpeth, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and the Right Hon. C. B. Wall. The Marquis of Lansdowne arrived in town to attend the Council from Windsor Castle.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.—The Theological department in this College, which has recently been formed for the instruction of candidates for holy orders, was opened on Friday (last week), when those who were desirous to undergo an examination by the Rev. Dr. Jelf, the principal, preparatory to admission. On account of the small expenses incurred in this department, a large number of persons have entered, who could not otherwise avail themselves of the advantages of a University education on account of its expensive character. The two Archbishops and twenty-three of the Bishops have consented to admit as candidates for holy orders those who produce the certificate granted at King's College. The course of study in this department continues during six academical terms (two years). At the close of the period a certificate is granted to each pupil, and to all students who have merited such a distinction by their attainments, and by their good character during the period of their studies in King's College, the Principal is empowered by the Council to grant an honorary certificate for the satisfaction of the Bishop to whom the candidate applies for holy orders

THE MENDICITY SOCIETY. The office of this excellent society is daily crowded with wretched persons of both sexes and all ages begging relief. In the last week, nearly 14,000 meals of a nutritious description were given away at the examination in question, and on Saturday 1260 men, women, and children were entertained with the usual quantity of provisions and with the lodging. The number and distress brought under the notice of the society, from the opening till the closing of its doors, is heartrending in the extreme.

DINNER TO MR. DAVID SALOMONS BY THE COOPERS' COMPANY.—On Tuesday, the Master and Wardens and Court of Assistants gave a splendid entertainment at the London Tavern, as a compliment to their brother, Mr David Salomons, upon his recent election and admission to the office of Alderman of the city of London, Mr. Salomons being the first of the Jewish nation admitted to that situation. Mr. Firth, the Master of the Company, presided; and was supported by the Lord Mayor and Mr. John Masterman, M.P

THE WINDOW TAX.—On Tuesday, at a meeting of the vestry of the parish of St. Pancras, the rector, the Rev. T. Dale, in the chair, a petition to the House of Commons, praying for the immediate repeal of the Window Tax, was unanimously adopted; and it was resolved that Lord Dudley Stuart should be requested to present it.

HEALTH OF THE METROPOLIS.—The deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, Jan. 29, were 1457, being exactly the number that was returned for the week ending Jan. 15 This return shows an excess above the average mortality of a week in winter of no less than 356; and, compared with the births in the same week (which were 1346), gives a majority of 111. Influenza has continued to decrease, and now counts only 36, though a fortnight ago, when the total mortality was the same, the deaths ascribed to the epidemic were 109. Bronchitis and pneumonia, measles and fever, continue to maintain a fatal ascendancy. Childbirth, or diseases incidental to it, was fatal in 19 cases, of which four are stated to have died from want of breath. Taking the number of children born in the week, it appears that one birth out of 79 was fatal to the mother.

ADJOURNED INQUEST ON THE MILLBANK PENITENTIARY.—On Wednesday Mr. Bedford held an inquest at the Millbank Penitentiary on the bodies of Samuel Shenton, aged 24, and James Dawson, aged 50, convicts. The deceased, Dawson, was admitted on the 9th of October last, having been convicted at the Liverpool Assizes, sentenced to transportation for life. He died on the 27th ult., of chronic diarrhœa with ulceration of the bowels. In the second case the deceased Shenton, upon whom a post-mortem was performed on the 30th September last, and having been at the Stafford Assizes sentenced to ten years' transportation, died of pulmonary consumption on the 30th ult. Mr. William Bailey, prison surgeon, stated that the deceased Dawson was in a dying state when he was admitted to the Infirmary, and that the disease was mainly attributable to the very unhealthy situation of the building. The prison itself was dry, but the locality was low, and calculated to engender disease. The surgeon, therefore, stated that the general depression of the prisoners who came there, might easily account for the number of ordinary cases of death which happened. In answer to the Coroner, the witness said he had made every suggestion possible, with a view to the improvement of the prison. Verdict, in both cases, "Natural death."

MELANCHOLY FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE. About half-past ten on Tuesday morning, a fire boy, about five years old, was burnt to death in Grove-place, New Cut, Lambeth. Two children named Brown, one a girl of four, and the boy five, were left sitting in chairs before the room fire, and during the absence of the mother the clothes of the boy became ignited. His screams brought the neighbours, who found the boy's clothes in flames, and the fire spreading round the room. The little sufferer survived only to have his partly-burnt things removed from him.

THE QUEEN V. THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY AND HIS VICAR-GENERAL.—It would be seen, from the elaborate report of the judgment pronounced in this case in the Court of Queen's Bench, that the case occupied was three hours and three-quarter minutes. The opinions were read, and the time was proportioned out as follows:—Mr Justice Erle (for discharging the rule) twenty minutes; Mr. Justice Coleridge (for issuing the writ) one hour and twenty minutes; Mr. Justice Patteson (for issuing the writ) fifty-five minutes; Lord Denman (for discharging

[illegible] Mr. Justice Wightman, pro Veritate, in the Queen's Bench? The only two cases, we believe, in which [illegible] Jail Court Judge to change into the full Court are, first, on a motion for a new trial in a case which he may have tried on circuit; secondly, on the occurrence of a case in which any one of the other four Judges has been counsel, or is personally interested. But not only has neither of these conditions been fulfilled in the present instance, but there has even been reason why, if Mr. Justice Erle had been in court, he should have changed out of it, for Mr. Justice Erle was counsel for Dr. Hampden in the M'Mullan case in 1843.—The Guardian.

FINE ARTS.

"LES ENFANS D'EDOUARD."

PAINTED BY PAUL DELAROCHE.

This celebrated Picture was painted in 1831, and exhibited in the same year at the Louvre. It was immediately purchased by the French Government, for the Gallery of the Luxembourg, where it has since remained.

The subject of this admirable composition is too well known to our readers to require description; whilst the popularity which it has enjoyed all over Europe, renders superfluous any commentary upon its excellence. The young victims of the Usurper are amusing themselves in looking at the pictures of a book of old legends; the melancholy abstraction of the young Edward contrasting sadly with the anxiety depicted on the countenance of his younger brother, whose attention has been awakened by the bark of a little spaniel, attracted to the door by the sounds of the approaching steps of the assassins. The strong light coming from under the door is one of the fine effects of the picture. The costume of the Princes, the bedstead, and its draperies, were carved and made in England, from the best authorities, under the superintendence of Delaroche, who came expressly to London, to visit the scene of his picture.

The rank which M. Delaroche holds among French artists is that of a Chef d'Ecole. We have already engraved in our Journal his Portrait of Napoleon; the Head of the Saviour; and the Pilgrims at Rome.

Several of Delaroche's pictures have been purchased by English noblemen, and adorn their galleries. A list of the most important works of so eminent an artist,—whose influence upon the art of his country, and, perhaps, of our own, has been so great—may not be unacceptable to our artistical readers.

One of his first pictures that attracted notice, was Joan of Arc in Prison.

The following are either quite English in their subjects, or are connected with English history:—

Cromwell Looking at Charles I. in his Coffin.
Charles I. Insulted by the Soldiers.
Strafford Going to Execution.

These three pictures are in the Sutherland Collection.

The Death of Elizabeth, and the picture we have engraved above are in the Luxembourg Gallery.

Lady Jane Grey, Mazin on his Death-bed, and Richelieu on the Rhone, are in the collection of M. de Pourtales.

The Pilgrims at Rome, and the Holy Family, are in the gallery of the King of Prussia. The Holy Family was exhibited, a few years since, at the Royal Academy.

An old lady, who died recently at Aberdeen, and whose will has just been proved in London, has enumerated therein every article which belonged to her, whether in sets, pairs, or units, and down to the very crockery, hardware, and culinary utensils, being a full and perfect inventory of all she possessed, which added not a little to the expenses attending the proving the same—very unlike the north.

Depredations of the Wolves in France.—A letter from Baumes-les-Dames, on the Doubs, states that the country round that place is infested with wolves. A few days ago as two children, one ten years of age and the other eight, were on their way home from a farm-house, they met a wolf, and on their attempt to fly the younger child fell, and was immediately carried off by the wolf into a neighbouring forest. A diligent search was made, but no trace of the child could be found.

[1] This subject has frequently been painted by English artists. One of the most popular is the picture painted by Northcote, for the Shakspere Gallery, and one of his best works. It has been engraved, and is known as "The Murder of the Two Princes in the Tower."

"LES ENFANS D'EDOUARD."—PAINTED BY DELAROCHE.

MUSIC.

The Royal Society of Musicians.—The 110th Anniversary Festival of this excellent institution will be celebrated on Tuesday, Feb. 22, in the Freemasons' Hall, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge being the President of the day. Independently of the great object of the gathering—the sacred cause of charity—there is at these festivals always a great musical treat, the most eminent vocalists and instrumentalists, without distinction of country, cheerfully coming forward, to aid this invaluable society, to sustain aged and indigent musicians, their widows and orphans, in the hour of need.

Mendelssohn's "Antigone."—The second and last morning performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone," took place on Wednesday, at the St. James's Theatre. We regret, for the sake of Mr. Mitchell, the enterprising lessee, the failure of these representations; but of all works, "Antigone," both for dramatic and musical results, depends essentially for effect on the exertions of a large mass of performers, and the resources of the establishment were certainly not in proportion to this obvious necessity.

Drury Lane Theatre.—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" has been again postponed until Saturday (this evening). The season is advancing, and the want of novelty has been attended with its usual result, indifferent audiences. It has been a great error in the management, to have opened this theatre without a varied répertoire. Only one opera was mounted, "Lucia," and when the success of Madame Dorus Gras and Mr. Reeves had been interrupted by the production of Balfe's "Maid of Honour," nothing but ill fortune has followed. The neglect of securing an adequate double troupe for operas, has been sensibly felt. Such an exhibition as that of Saturday night last, in Donizetti's "Linda," we never before witnessed in the worst days of English opera. With Madame Dorus Gras, Miss Birch, and Miss Miran, Mr. Reeves and Mr. Weiss, there has been exhibited the greatest want of tact in not having brought out some work, to have sustained the good impression after the representation of "Lucia." Spirit, without judgment in operatic matters, only entails enormous expenses, without providing for the prospect of adequate returns.

THE MUSICAL SEASON.

Mr. Dando has commenced his annual series of Quartett Concerts, in the Throne Room, Crosby Hall. The Cecilian Society, on Thursday night, performed Locke's Music in "Macbeth." On the same evening, Mr. H. Russell gave his entertainment at the Mechanics' Institution, the "Singers of the Pyrenees," a concert at the Western Literary Institution; and Mr. J. W. Tavernor, his "Songs and Dramatic Illustrations of Shakspeare's plays, at the Sussex Hall.

On Monday night, Mr. Bertlon gives his concert at Drury Lane Theatre, when selections from his instrumental works will be heard for the first time in this country.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

Paris, Thursday.

Bellini's opera of "I Pirata" has been produced at the Salle Ventadour. It afforded Mario the occasion to create as powerful a sensation as he did recently in the "Donna del Lago." This marvellous tenor is now displaying a refinement of style, an intensity of dramatic expression, and a vigour of execution, that completely take the audiences by storm, on every occasion he is now heard. In addition to his beautiful chest tones, he is master of the most exquisite flat-notes in his head voice, and is able to conquer the most intricate divisions with ease and delicacy. Madame Castellan was the Imogène, but she did not produce the same effect as in Lucia; she has not physical force to render the powerful emotions. There is now question of mounting "La Gazza Ladra," for Grisi and Alboni. The project set on foot to form a second Italian Opera House, for the purpose of giving Verdi's operas, will come to nothing, as the Government is decidedly opposed to granting the necessary license. "Robert le Diable" is in active rehearsal at the Académie Royale de Musique, under the composer Meyerbeer's superintendence, for Bettini as Robert, Alizard as Bertram, Madame Julian Vangelder as Alice, and Mademoiselle Dobré as the Princess. On Saturday Madame Cinti Damoreau, the celebrated vocalist, takes her farewell of the public, at a concert in Herz's Rooms. Madame Fayel, the famed pianiste, and Alard, the violinist, will play solos in the programme. Adolphe Adam's lively opera of "Le Brasseur de Preston," originally produced at the Opera Comique in 1838, is meeting with great success at the Opera National. Mesdames Schroeder-Devrient, the great German prima donna, is about to produce a one-act opera at Riga, called "Saxon Switzerland." Emile Prudent's pianoforte concerts at Algiers have been very successful. From Vienna we learn that Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silesia" is to be performed at the An der Wien Theatre, with Madame Lutzer as Vielka, and Staudigl in his original part. Mdlle. Tuczek, of Berlin, has been singing with great success at the Ducal Theatre, in Gotha. In Berlin, Madame Viardot's performances are exciting unbounded enthusiasm; she sang recently, at a concert given by the Earl of Westmoreland, the English Minister, some Spanish melodies, in the most fascinating style. At the same concert, Signor Labocetta, who is engaged as tenor at her Majesty's Theatre in London, sang an Italian air, by Mercadante. A symphony, composed by his Lordship, was much applauded by the connoisseurs. The season at St. Petersburgh is drawing to a close. Lavia, the tenor, and Tamburini, depart for London, and Guasco, the tenor, for Paris. The opera-houses in Italy were quite deserted, owing to the political troubles.

Colosseum.—The exhibition of the Night Panorama of London during the day, will be closed in a few weeks; we advise all who have not seen it, and to whom an evening visit is inconvenient, to take advantage of the present arrangement for visiting this extraordinary work of art in the afternoon.

The Tea Trade.—The Revenue authorities having had under their consideration a representation from Messrs. Twining and others concerned in the tea trade, complaining of delay in the delivering of tea from the bonded warehouses at the London Docks, it has been announced that in future the accounts for the article deposited in the warehouses of these docks be kept in the office for the Comptroller of Tea Accounts, at the principal Custom-House in Thames-street, and the orders for the delivering of the article in bond, on payment of duty or otherwise, issued from that office in the same manner as for teas to be delivered from all the other tea warehouses in Cutler-street and Crutched Friars, in occupation of the other dock companies.

Transfer of Licenses.—The Board of Excise is now circulating the following general order:—Excise Office, London, Jan., 1848.—In pursuance of directions from the Right Hon. the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, dated the 24th ult.—Ordered: That in future licensed traders be allowed, at any time during the currency of their licenses, to transfer their business to any other premises, in which the same can be legally carried on, free of any additional charge for license duty beyond that which would arise in case the rate of such duty should be enhanced from the increased value of the new premises; that all the particulars of such transfers be endorsed by the proper collector on the license; and that, whenever any additional duty shall arise, the trader be surcharged, in respect thereof, for the quarter or quarters of the year which may be unexpired.—By the Board, Geo. Ballard.

South Wales Railway.—The Directors have given orders to the contractors of this line to finish that portion between Newport and Swansea with all possible dispatch, in order that it may be opened in the spring of next year.

Grand Western and Ulverston Railway.—At a meeting of this company, held on Monday at the offices, West Strand, Mr. Paul in the chair, it was resolved not to enter into any contract for the execution of the works during a period of eleven months; and to petition the Railway Commissioners for an extension of time under the Act recently passed. The number of assents in favour of the resolution was 955; and of dissents against it, 260.

On the night of the 24th ult., two men, armed with guns, and wearing large cloaks, stopped the diligence from Avignon to Nismes, at about a league from the former place. They made the four passengers which the diligence contained descend, and then helped themselves to a bag containing 700f., after which they made off across the fields and thus escaped. A sum of 6000f. was in a box in the diligence, but luckily the thieves did not discover it.

Chloroform.—The Augsburg Gazette, of the 26th ult., gives the order issued by the Bavarian Government, on the 25th, respecting the use of chloroform during surgical operations. The application of this drug is henceforth to be confided solely to scientific and duly authorised physicians and surgeons; but, cuppers, country practitioners, surgeons, and dentists, who have not taken their degree, as well as midwives and unlicensed accoucheurs, are strictly prohibited from using it. The sale and purchase of chloroform are to be subject to the prescribed restrictions which apply to poisons and other injurious drugs.

REMBRANDT'S GREAT SABRE PORTRAIT.

At the sale of the late Baron Verstolk's collection of Rembrandt's etchings in October last, our readers may recollect some of the choicest gems were purchased by the Messrs. Smith, of Lisle-street, for the Print Room of the British Museum. One of these very interesting acquisitions was the Great Sabre Portrait, which our draftsman and engraver have copied in fac simile in the annexed Illustration, where every line is faithfully given.

Of this very fine work there are but four impressions known. One is in the Bibliothèque Royale, at Paris, where it has been framed for many years, and shown as one of the most extraordinary curiosities of the Print Department. The second impression is in the Museum at Amsterdam; and the third was formerly in Lord Aylesford's collection, and is now the property of R. Holford, Esq.

The fourth Print is that lately purchased, by the British Museum, at Baron Verstolk's sale. This impression, the finest of the four, was bought, many years since, by Baron Denon, at Venice; it afterwards passed into Mr. T. Wilson's collection, which was purchased by Mr. Woodburn, who sold this Print to Baron Verstolk Van Soelen, the Dutch Secretary of State, at whose sale it was bought for 1806 guilders, about £150, besides the auction duty of 7½ per cent.

This curious Print is, in this state, a nearly square plate, measuring 7 9-10 inches high, by 6 4-10 wide. It was afterwards cut into an oval, measuring 5 1-10 inches high, by 4 2-10 wide. Fine impressions, even in this state, are by no means common.

There were also bought from the above collection for the British Museum, the following Etchings by Rembrandt:—"Six's Bridge," first state, unique; 199 guilders. The same Print, second state, very rare; 70 guilders. Landscape, with three cottages, first state, excessively rare, 369 guilders. "Ephraim Bonus," the Jewish physician, undoubtedly Rembrandt's finest work, and a matchless Print; in the first state, of which only three others are known; 1650 guilders.

Rembrandt was equally distinguished as an etcher and a painter. He is supposed to have acquired the taste for the concentration and unity of light and shade, which characterise his works, from the peculiar light he must have been accustomed to in early life, in his father's mill. His Etchings amount to nearly four hundred; they are dated from 1628 to 1661. "His best works," says a contemporary, "are greatly and deservedly prized, for they are inimitably fine, and possess the excellences of the best paintings, even by his own hand, in a degree not equalled by the works of any other engraver."

ADDITIONS TO THE PRINT ROOM.

We have the gratification to announce a very interesting purchase just made of Messrs. Smith, through whose hands the above Etchings passed. This new accession consists of two rare Prints by Faithorne—Cromwell, between two pillars; and Margaret Smith, a proof, of which there is only another—in the Bibliothèque Royale, at Paris. Next are 238 Prints and Drawings, by Rembrandt, from Lord Aylesford's Collection. There are, likewise, upwards of 500 English and Foreign Historical Portraits, including the most remarkable from the late Sir Masterman Sykes's Collection. Among the other items are two rare Prints by Marc Antonio, unfinished, and curious, as exhibiting the mode by which the old Engravers worked. The great merit of Marc Antonio lay in the correctness and beauty of his outline: so great is his excellence in this respect that it is believed that Raphael himself assisted him with his own hand on the copper. There are, too, a few Drawings and Prints by Hollar; one of them, a drawing, shows the interior of Westminster Hall, with the Courts of Law sitting. The amount of this very interesting purchase is £4200.

FAC SIMILE OF THE GREAT SABRE PORTRAIT, THE CELEBRATED ETCHING BY REMBRANDT, JUST PURCHASED FOR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

SUMMARY PENALTIES IN EGYPT.—There has recently been a great stir amongst the European residents of Cairo, owing to Mehemet Ali having taken upon himself to administer a severe bastinado to a Greek subject for some quarrel he had got into with a native woman on a trifling matter. On the Greek being brought up by the native authorities before the Pasha, his Highness being no doubt in ill-humour at the time, ordered the man to be bastinadoed forthwith. No less than 650 stripes were consequently administered, from the effects of which the man very nearly died. Owing to the recent misunderstanding between the Sultan and the Greek Government, there has been no authorised Greek Consul in Egypt for some time past to protect the interests of the Greeks; but there is no doubt that the Pasha will have to indemnify the Greek handsomely for his unjustifiable interference in ordering him to be bastinadoed, as in no case whatever has Mehemet Ali the right to interpose in matters regarding European subjects, who are under the jurisdiction of their respective Consuls.

GENERAL TAYLOR ON TEMPERANCE.—The Major-General of the United States army, having received a letter as to his views on total abstinence, says—"I am myself virtually an observer of the rule of total abstinence, and find my health and ability to endure hardships greatly increased thereby; but, though in my own person I observe this habit, yet, when used in moderation, I am not an opponent to the use of ardent spirits."

AN ACCOUNT OF THE CULTURE AND MANUFACTURE OF TEA IN CHINA. By SAMUEL BALL, Esq. Longman and Co.

By the Overland Mail, received on Tuesday last, we learn that the Bengal Government have just taken definitive steps for carrying out experiments in several parts of the Bengal Presidency, and in the north-west provinces, for the growth of tea on a large scale. A grant has been devoted to the undertaking, under the superintendence of Dr. Jamieson (nephew of Professor Jamieson, of Edinburgh); and this gentleman has already chosen several localities in the hilly countries west of the Jumna, and proceeded as far as Kangra, where a series of levels, on a plateau, varying in altitude from 3000 to 4000 feet, offer, it is stated, every probability for the successful cultivation of the plant. In aid of the experiment, the British authorities at Hong Kong have been requested to dispatch to India a number of Chinamen for the manufacture of the tea, and also seeds from the most celebrated districts.

The receipt of this intelligence almost on the day of publication of the above volume, considerably enhances the value and interest of the subject—the Cultivation and Manufacture of Tea in China; but more especially the aiding of the cultivator in the several attempts which are now in progress for the cultivation of the tea tree, on an extended scale, in British India, and other parts of the world. Although only one chapter of Mr. Ball's volume is devoted to these experiments, its entire contents must be regarded as subsidiary to this branch of colonial industry and enterprise, for they consist of practical instructions for every branch of the growth and manipulation of the tea plant, as practised in China; as well as a commercial view of the proposed extension to our colonies.

Any work which treats of so essential a luxury, nay, so absolute a requisite, as tea is in the domestic economy of nearly every house in the empire, must be acceptable to a large class of readers. We have now used the fragrant leaf which "smokes as an infusion on our tables," for nearly two centuries; yet a large crop of errors and misconceptions as to the cultivation and manufacture of the plant remained to be uprooted; and, notwithstanding every work of the utilitarian class, so numerous in the last quarter of a century, has abounded with information upon the subject, there remained to be answered the question "In what consists the difference between black and green Teas."

Our readers must not, however, expect to find in this work the social history of the tea plant, the records of its introduction, its consumption, or any of the domestic curiosities of the subject. On the contrary, Mr Ball's immediate aim is utility rather than amusement; though the general reader will find, in this volume, a variety of interesting information, not of that cut and dried sort which the familiarity of the topic might lead one to expect, but corrective of much misinformation, and altogether welcome to a very large class.

The fitness of the author of this work for his labour consists of experience gathered in his late office of Inspector of Teas to the East India Company in China. At Canton, Mr. Ball noted the processes of the manipulation of Tea from conversations with growers and manipulators from the Tea districts; from written documents furnished by Chinese; from published works in the same language; and from correspondence with a Spanish missionary long residentin the province of Fokien, the Echea country. For several years, however, Mr. Ball's materials lay fallow; but, in 1839, the Assam Tea experiments revived the interest of the subject; then came Liebig's Chemistry of Agriculture, which has assisted Mr. Ball to work out a theory concerning black Tea; and, lastly, Mr. Jacobson's Handbook on the cultivation of Tea at Java which has enabled our author to bring his labours to a close, in the volume before us. With these exceptions, he has only quoted original sources; but he respectfully notices Dr. Lettsom's excellent pamphlet on the Tea Plant, and the able chapters on the subject in Dr Royle's work on the "Botany of the Himalayan Mountains," and in his "Productive Resources of India."

Mr. Ball's volume comprises thirteen chapters of facts, as closely packed as a chest of the finest Congou. It commences with the early history of the Tea Plant, which appears to have been used for fifteen centuries past in China, where it is now the drink of all classes. It grows over the vast space of twenty-eight degrees of latitude, and thirty degrees of longitude; so that it is subject to great variations of heat and cold, and other differences of climate. In Java it grows in the mountains, at from 3000 to 4500 feet above the sea, where it is very finely flavoured; but it deteriorates in lower districts. Hence, there would appear nothing to fear from climate in our colonial attempts at cultivation; indeed, we have always understood the great difficulty to lie in the manipulation.

The culture and gathering, of course, are detailed by Mr. Ball; from which we are sorry to find that no great attention is bestowed upon Teas intended for the European markets. Weather is important to the gathering of fine Teas; but Congou, which is the staple of our consumption, is sometimes gathered, whole branches at a time, in all weathers. The choicest Teas, on the contrary, are plucked leaf by leaf, sorted, and packed in small parcels, inscribed with mystical characters, denoting the flower the Tea resembles in colour, and sometimes the district it was grown in. The finest Tea, by the way, is entirely free from stalks; and scent is often a disguise for inferior qualities of Tea.

The leaves, when first gathered, have a rank vegetable taste and smell, and to get rid of this by evaporation, without injury to the aroma, is the great secret of tea curing. Mr. Ball regards this process as an incipient fermentation, such as takes place in hay, during which its requisite flavour is evolved. Of this care, Congou gets little: it is gathered and manipulated in indiscriminate haste for our market. The Bohea is sometimes gathered, dried, and roasted in a day.

Green and Black Tea are produced from the same plant, though the botanists were long at issue about this matter. The idea of Green Tea being dried upon copper is proved to be a popular fallacy, for the Tea would be flavoured and spoiled in the process: besides, the bloom can be given by harmless means. Dr. Lettsom, by the way, thought it was given by a vegetable process. Mr. Ball next describes an experiment by which he proved that Tea may be dried black and green, at once, in the same vessel, and over the same fire; be divided the pan, and the leaves on one side he kept in motion, and the other quiet; when the latter became black and the former green; thus proving the difference of colour to be not derived from any management of heat, but from manipulation, the heat being the same in both cases. At the same time, certain roguish Chinese glaze our Hyssons most unscrupulously; and it has been proved by chemical analysis that the Chinese Green Teas are artificially coloured, though not with indigo, as represented by the green tea merchants. We may add that Gunpowder tea is dried at the lowest; and the chemical cause of Black Tea is its loss of tannin, in its drying previous to roasting, an opinion supported by the recent testimony of Liebig. Again, Mr. Ball thinks there may be one species of tea plant, but several varieties, but that all botanical difference is destroyed in the course of packing.

In the concluding chapter, Mr. Ball treats of the introduction of the culture and manipulation of Tea into India. "The discovery of the Tea-Tree in Assam," says the author, "and the recent successful cultivation of the Chinese plant at Kamaon, in the upper provinces of India, encourage a well-grounded hope, that this valuable tree may soon be enumerated among the useful products of our extensive Eastern possessions, and thus conduce to the comfort of the native inhabitants, as well as to the internal prosperity and commercial relations of the country. It is generally admitted that the natives of India have a decided predilection for Tea; and could this article be afforded at a sufficiently low price, little doubt is entertained that its consumption would rapidly spread over that immense peninsula; and when we consider the abstinence from animal food, which is imposed on the Hindoo by his religion, we cannot but think that the introduction and adoption of the Mongolian method of using tea in its broth-like form, mixed with butter and meal, would furnish not only a refreshing, but a somewhat substantial adjunct to his meagre dietary; while the leaf used as an infusion,— would administer greatly to his comfort, health, and sobriety.

'the cups
That cheer, but not inebriate,'

"If tea can be produced in India at no greater cost than in China, can it be doubted, that an extensive cultivation of it must be greatly instrumental in promoting, and even forcing, an opening to commercial intercourse with the whole extent of Central Asia, and which may not be so readily effected by other means? It would be easy to exchange our tea, woollens, and perhaps felt and calicoes, for shawl-wool, horses, metals, and other articles, as well as for rhubarb and musk, which are already procured from Tibet by way of Canton.

"Nor does there appear much reason to doubt, that we may even compete with China in the British, European, and American markets, in the supply of teas suited to general consumption, if not in the highest flavoured teas."

Mr. Ball then examines the comparative values of labour in China and India, the comparative state of the Tea-trade during the existence of the East India Company's Charter, and the non-restrictive system now established in China. We quote a portion of the author's conclusions.

"The quantity of Tea manufactured at Java from 1839 to 1844, exhibits an annual average of 216,000 lbs., so far as the contents of each package can be established. And Mr Jacobson, the superintendent of the plantation, shows, by calculations grounded on the actual cost of cultivation and manipulation, the fact that Tea may be shipped from that island at eight pence the pound. These statements are also appended to this chapter, and are minute and satisfactory in their details; and there can be no reason why Tea should not be produced in India at the same cost as at Java. Indeed, if Tea can be manipulated and packed in China at its cost of growth, for seven or eight pence the pound, as now shown, it may fairly be assumed, so far as the price of labour is concerned, that the same quality of Tea ought to be shipped from India at four or five pence the pound. Thus, it appears, from the habits and wants of the two people—Chinese and Hindoo,—from the rate of wages in the two countries, and from actual experiments,—so far as these afford certainty of result in conjunction with concurrent testimony to the success of the cultivation of Tea at Java,—that India possesses an undoubted power of competing with China in the European and American markets in the cultivation of Tea."

The work closes with a hope that the Bengal Government will bestir themselves in the matter; and that this has been realised is shown by the intelligence quoted at the opening of this paper. The work contains much incidental curious information upon the varieties of Tea, the modes of its consumption, &c. It is illustrated with views of the Tea districts, and wood-cuts of the various stages of the manipulatory process, &c. In fine, it is, by many degrees, the most complete work yet published "On the Cultivation and Manufacture of Tea in China."

THE BRITISH ANGLER'S MANUAL. By T. C. HOFLAND, Esq. New Edition. By E. JESSE, Esq. Bohn.

The author of this work was not only a practical angler, and a true lover of nature, but a landscape painter of great merit. Hence, his love of the country is evident in every page of the present volume. It has, besides, another recommendation: it is not written with the conventional affectation in which anglers love to revel; it has, perhaps, less of the coxcombry of "the gentle craft" than any book of the kind. The author died in 1842; and a relative has prefixed a memoir of his life, which appears to have been chequered with the cares and crosses almost inseparable from the career of genius. However, our business is rather with the book than its author; it is carefully written, but we fear not so carefully edited, if we are to judge by Mr. Jesse styling Mr. Chamberlain Clark Sir Richard Clark, in the notice of Cowley's house at Chertsey. The illustrations, upon steel and wood, are numerous and beautiful; they are mostly from picturesque and drawings by Mr. Hofland. The book was originally published at a high price, but is now reduced in this respect.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR FEBRUARY.

A FALLING OFF AT PARIS

As to the restaurants, cafés, and rôtisseurs, the falling off was lamentable. The Café de Virginie, in the Rue de la Paix, formerly so crowded between nine and twelve, and five and seven, with English, was deserted and abandoned by them; and you might find the Galignani newspaper, generally so much in request, for eleven hours out of the twelve unoccupied and unbespoken. So it was, in a less degree, at the Café Anglaise on the Boulevards. The matutinal cutlets, steaks, and sidneys, in the rue de Champagne, were no longer called for in such quantity; and one stout gentleman, known to the waiters by the name of Nuits—for he always drank a bottle of that particular Burgundy wine for breakfast, and who was called by the one, in his way somewhat of a classic, after minately Nox and Erebus—and who had been an habitué of the house since the days when the Vicomte St. Cricq, in 1830, played his pranks of beginning dinner there with a basin of skim milk, was also (sad test of all!) found missing after what the Parisians call la saison des eaux. In wine alone this wealthy man used to spend at least 3000 francs, or £120 a-year at the Café Anglaise; and though few of his countrymen knew him, it has since transpired that he was a retired civil servant who lost the greatest part of a large fortune by the famine of two Indian Summers. Poor fellow! he is now doomed to the obscurity of an English provincial town, and forced to drink Bass's beer instead of Beaune, and Charrington's XX instead of Chateau Margaux.—Fraser's Magazine.

FOSSIL CONUNDRUM.

Why is the Ornithorhynchus paradoxus (See Penny Cyclopædia, Vol. 17, for what will never understand what it is written!) like a tailor? Because it is a beast with a bill (which everybody will understand at once).—Man in the Moon

NEWTON'S DISCOVERY

It has been noticed as a very unconvertible circumstance, that Newton never made any important addition to scientific discovery after he had completed his forty-fifth year; though he lived to be eighty-four, and had therefore got beyond the period at which the poet's apostrophe, "O for a do-nothing," might have been addressed to him. He was exceedingly fond of tobacco, and it is believed that he felt more at home in his astronomical reflections when he could envelope himself in a cloud of his own blowing. The fact, however, that "there is no snake without fire," received an apt confirmation from the fact that Newton was scarcely ever without a pipe in his mouth during the most brilliant and blazing period of his genius.—Comic History of England.

THE CUP OF PATIENCE

Patience is the strongest of strong drinks—for it kills the giant Despair And sweet it is to think there is no beggar so beggared who may not enter- tain his cup-bearer Beautiful Hebe—love-eyed, and clothed in woven light! who, unseen, minister to the widow and fatherless; who fill the strength- ening cup for stumbling wan; who glide through prison-bars, and, solacing the patriot with the draught, hopeful music and the thanking of his chains! Delicious drink. And there have been men, who, thirsting so, have got so drunk upon patience, that the sweet intoxication has endured for their lives. Unlike the vinous drunkard, the heaven-and-hell tramping sailor in the tipp ling they never feel. Therefore, doubly beautiful is the cup of patience, or there is no remorseful morrow at the bottom.—Douglas Jerrold's Shilling Magazine.

A SCENE IN CHAMBERS

Was there ever such a night! There stood a greasy gridiron, side by side with at least a dozen dirty, stale tobacco pipes. Here was a grubby tin saucepan, with a black-jug bottle ins de it. In one corner was a pile of dirty plates and dishes, and just over them, I should say, a pound of kitchen candles. In another corner was a trumpery Bachelor's Comfort, indeed I guaranteed to boil a quart of water with a bundle of firewood, in less than five minutes. And on the she-f, just above it, stood a tin "Mutium in Parvo," which was warranted to cook a steak, in an egg, steam potatoes, or boil a kettle for shaving, with a spoon- ful or two of any spirits, British brandy excepted. On the top shelf, all among the black lead and Bath brick- stood three unwashed tea cups, and the knives and forks, whilst at the bottom there were, I should say, exactly three quarts of coals, and about a dozen potatoes, but they were so grimy, that really it required a practised eye to tell, at first sight, whether the potatoes were really kidneys or the best kord-anayon. Where to Marry, and How to get Married.

CAREER OVERTAKEN BY DOMMEY

All this time the people on the stairs were ringing at the bell, and knocking with their hands and feet. He was not a coward; but these sounds, what had gone before; the strangeness of the place, which had confused them, even in his return from the hall; the frustration of his schemes (for, strange to say, he would have been much bolder, if they had succeeded); the unreasonable time; the recollection of having no one near to whom he could appeal; the dread of a bailiff office; above all, the sudden sense, which made even his heart beat like lead, that the man whose confidence he had outraged, and whom he had so treach- erously deceived, was there to recognise and challenge him, all these took plucked off his face; struck a panic through him. He tried the door in which the veil was shut, but couldn't force it. He opened one of the windows, and peered down through the lattice of the blind, into the court-yard. But it was a high leap, and the stones were pitiless. The ringing and knocking still continu- ing—his panic too—he went back to the door in the bedchambers, and with some new efforts, and some stubborn efforts, he pulled it open, and, Seeing the little staircase not far off, and feeling the night-air coming up, he stole back for his hat and coat, made the door as secure after him as he could, crept down lamp in hand, extinguished it on seeing the street, and hurried up put it in a cor- ner, went out where the stars were shining Dombey and Son

CHILDREN'S TOYS.

He who has never dedicated an entire holiday to play in it the part of wan- dering Telemachus with a child for his Mentor—tracking, with docile feet, at the caprice of his guide, a labyrinthine career from street to street, and from shop to shop—as well as he may the fitful progress of miscellaneous cui- osities from an inexhaustible half-sovereign distending with a museum of pur- chases all the pockets of his garments, from which protrude the mouths of tin- trumpets, and the snouts of harlequins, and the tails of elastic frogs, and the extremities of Noah's ark, as the horns of a goat have been seen to protrude the jaws of a gorged boa-constrictor, -steering so freighted deviously homewards, with the consciousness that his object has been long and gallantly to have real- semblance to a carrier's wagon surrendering gradually the cargo to the ra- pine of a little nation of "young barbarians all at play," and, ultimately losing all recollection of everything in the vehement pursuit of elastic frogs, and the screams of envy he who has never done all this, and never felt the keenest in- terest while he was doing it, has failed to study so as to decipher a pregnant page in the diaries of Ulysses. We cannot conceive the meddling ever out- side to him Out of the toys comes the passion, the reflection, the action which sig- nify the child to be so infinitely above the beasts that perish; out of the child come the man who may sway empires. These bubbles are the world in full always of animation, yet such constant repetitions one of another, are they not like the pyramids of Nile? Centuries make no change on them. But who has quite dug out the meaning which keep curiosity alive? From a sparkling paper on Christmas Books, in the North British Review, No. 16

THE "NATIONAL DEFENCE EPIDEMIC"

There is one reflection consequent on this movement respecting the means and material of war. We are encroaching on the thirty-third year of European peace. During that long period, we must have expended four to five hundred millions sterling on the means of warfare. The opportunity of teaching peace and pa- cific opinions to all our neighbours has been open, and has been neglected. In that neglect the present movement and the future danger, whatever that may be, have their origin. One per cent., or one-half per cent., of the war outlay expended in teaching peace, would, ere now, have rendered war impossible amongst European nations. Mr Cobden argues, that, in making progress with free-trade opinions, he and his friends have been rearing a barrier against war. They, undoubtedly, have rendered war more difficult; but the barrier is prin- cipally on one side. When they teach European nations to adopt our present principles of trade, they will interpose an obstacle to war that even the most sanguinary will respect. Those who teach the necessity of peace, on the im- propriety or wickedness of war, are in a similar position. They cannot secure peace by promulgating their opinions in one nation alone. Commerce can propitiously by consent of two or more nations, but even that can be main- tained only by a similar concurrence. One state may destroy trade or kindle war, but one state alone can neither increase commercial, nor maintain pacific relations.—Tait's Magazine.

END OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE II.

Such was the state of the people and the country at this period, that we can- not be sorry to get out of their company, though it is not without some regret that we bid farewell for a time to our History. In the course of this work we have rowed in the same galley with Cæsar, stood up to our ankles in sea-water with Canute, ran after the assassinat's daughter with Gilbert à Becket, wielded a battle-axe with Richard on the field of Bosworth, smoked a pipe and eaten a potatoe with Sir Walter Raleigh, danced with Sir Christopher Hatton on Tier-ceval Green, and sailed round the bay that bears his name with honest Bill Baffin; all these advantages we've enjoyed in right good company, but next ideal of a railway, with nothing to pay and no fear of accidents.. Comic History of England.

GAUNT HOUSE

All the world knows that Lord Steyne's town palace stands in Gaunt-square. Persons under the railings, and there the lime trees unto the garden of the square, you see a few miserable governesses with bandaged pugs, melancholy, round and round it, and round the dreary grass-plot, in the centre of which rises the statue of Lord Gaunt, who fought at Minden, in a three-cocked wig, and other- wise habited like a Roman Emperor Gaunt House occupies nearly a side of the square. The remaining three sides are composed of mansions that have passed away into dowagerdom—tall, dark houses, with window-tax of stone, or pucker ments now; and hospitality to have passed away from those doors as much as the laced footmen and linkmen, who used to pop out with their torches in the blank iron extinguishers that still flank the lamps over the steps. Brass plates have penetrated into the square Doctors, the Diddlesex Bank Western Branch—the English and European Reunion, &c.—it has a dreary look—nor is my Lord Steyne's palace less dreary. All I have ever seen of it is the vast wall in front, with the rustic columns at the great gate, through which an old porter peers sometimes with a fat and gloomy red face —and over the wall the garret and bed-room windows, and the chimneys, out of which there seldom comes any smoke now. For the present Lord Steyne lives at Naples, preferring the view of the Bay and Capri and Vesuvius, to the dreary aspect of the wall in Gaunt-square.—Vanity Fair.

(b) Kt to Kt 5th, and then Q to her B + 4th, would have been better play, we believe

(c) Kt to K 8 4th seems preferable Black, however, gets an attacking post, as by the present play.

(d) Was this necessary? It looks like lost time. Why not at once have thrown forward the K P ?

(e) This is quite beyond our fathoming By taking the K R P, or playing P to K B 8th, Black appears to have a winning position

(f) The adversary's error in his last move leaves White an easy victory.

SURRENDER OF ARMS. The King's County Chronicle states that "upwards of 100 stand of arms, voluntarily surrendered by the respectable farmers in the barony of Coolack, have been conveyed under a strong escort of police, and deposited in the barracks."

THE LATE FATHER MAGUIRE.—Dr. Brady, of Gardiner-street, to whom the executors of the late Rev. T. Maguire will as the stomach of his brother's wife, have been sent up for analyzation, swore on Thursday (last week), before the magistrates of the head office of police, Dublin, that the stomachs of Mr and Mrs. Maguire contained a large quantity of arsenic. They had been in Dublin for the purpose of administering to the will of the late Rev. T. Maguire, and had only returned to the country three days before their dissolution. The parties supposed to be implicated in the transaction have fled.

FATAL CONFLICT.—On Wednesday (last week) Mr. Peyton, one of the Coroners of the county Roscommon, proceeded to execute a law process at the suit of Mr. George Church, of Carrick-on-Shannon, against Hubert Kelly Waldron, Esq., J P., of Ashford, near Drumsna. The Coroner was accompanied by some bailiffs and a number of the police force; but on reaching the gate entrance was met by Mr. Waldron, who, with his son and a considerable number of retainers, stood inside, armed, and in an attitude of defence. The gate was closed, and the Coroner demanded admission, which was peremptorily refused. Mr. Waldron, stating that he had "met one Mr. Peyton, an old man, and walked a little." The Coroner explained that he should perform his duty, and remonstrated against the folly of resistance. But the ill-fated Mr. Waldron could not be brought to reason. Two of the Coroner's men, after some further parley, proceeded to apply crowbars to the gate with a view to force it, when Mr. Waldron fired from within through the bars, severely wounding one of the men. The police immediately fired, when the affray became general, and no less than from 12 to 15 shots were exchanged through the gate. Mr. Waldron received a ball in the forehead, and fell lifeless to the ground. Several of his relations were severely wounded in the face, and a boy, a son of Mr. Waldron, a lad about fifteen years of age, was taken prisoner, and is now confined in the county gaol Mr. Waldron was an aged man, about fifty-five, of extravagant habits, and much embarrassed. The police afterwards entered a house, and seized guns, &c.; and five of the men that appeared in arms having got into the yard, the Coroner made a seizure, and brought what was available to Elphin. One bailiff was very severely wounded in the face, and a policeman in the leg, but not mortally. There was a claim on the goods when seized, that they belonged to another person than Mr. Waldron's death. The valuable property had to be left behind, through seized, for want of a force to remove it.

REINOUS MURDER. The following statement is furnished by a Doneralle Correspondent of the Cork Examiner of Monday last:—"A murder, heinous and grievous in itself, has disgraced this neighbourhood. A poor industrious old widow woman, Johanna Murphy, who resided at Kilburn, near the village of Ballydesmond, was found dead on Wednesday last, seated on her chair, apparently as if occupied at her usual employment, 'quilting,' with a quilt in the frame before her. Her head had cuts in four different places, inflicted by a billhook, which were also sufficient to cause death. From the inquest, it appears that a lad named Richard Ryall, about thirteen years of age, who had sought to throw the guilt upon his own father, had a verdict of 'Wilful Murder' returned against him by the Jury. Seven pence were the fruits of this horrible murder. The poor widow possessed. It appears that this Ryall's mission to the locality which was the scene of this murder was that of perfidy, encouraged by the hope of reward, in giving information respecting two persons who were alleged to have been cut off from the Kingstown estate, for the purpose of representing the district to be in a disturbed state. It is to be deplored that encouragement should be given to miscreants by whom the lives and liberties of inoffensive persons are endangered. But a short time since honest and industrious persons suffered incarceration, and some of them death from gaol sickness, on the testimony of this wretch, who hesitated not to accuse his own parent, and at another time another honest man, of this diabolical deed. At a former period he had been supported by the police as a Crown witness, and it is suspected that he committed the murder to get possession of the woman's money, or that, in the absence of other crimes, he did it, in order to have matter for an accusation, and thus get a reward."

WE understand that the sentence of death passed on Michael M'Cabe, as being an accomplice in the murder of Mr. and Mrs Wraith and their servant, at Milfield, has been commuted into one of transportation for life.

ATTORNEYS AND COUNTY COURTS.—A case of very considerable importance, involving the question of the power of the County Courts judges in cases over the persons of attorneys, has just been decided by Lord Denman, in a case in which Mr. Thomas Jepson Wagner, an attorney at Banbury, had been sued in the County Court of that town, and in default of complying with the Judge's order, an attachment had been issued out against him. Mr. Wagner laid the particulars of the case before the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, who immediately issued a warrant, directed to the Judge of the Banbury County Court, which has entirely settled any difference of opinion as to the power of the Court in this respect, as it prohibits absolutely, except in "pleas of freehold, felonies, or appeal," the taking of Mr. Wagner, or any other attorney connected with the Queen's Bench, into custody, and orders him, if in custody, to be discharged.

PARIS FASHIONS.

WINTER Fashions are entirely cut in Paris; the very hard frost of these last days have determined ladies to cover their dresses with furs, and the velvets and satins, in dark shades, have totally replaced light-coloured silks, only employed at present for evening parties. The Engraving of this day represents ladies in their walking-dresses. Black velvet bonnet, lined with pink terry velvet, with an oiseau de paradis fixed over, or a long black feather, falling on the side. Mantle and muff of handsome ermine. Gown in dark blue terry velvet (velours épingle.) The hair is dressed à la Sevigné. The other lady is attired with a pink terry velvet bonnet, lined with white satin; a frill of pink blond ornaments the upper part of the bonnet. Mantle in black velvet, embroidered all round with soutache, and trimmed with a large Spanish fringe; the mantle is lined with a light pink satin, stitched across. This new shape is most becoming to the figure. Muff in sable; gown in dark grey reps. These gowns are worn very long, to cover the feet. Boots in black velvet.

The nurse wears a handsome cap, à la Cauchoise, all trimmed with dentelles de Caen; a gown of coarse cloth, striped violet and white. Mauve velvet ribbon and a gold cross encircle the neck. White apron, with plaits gathered around the waist.

The baby has a long blue satin frock, trimmed with swan. Bonnet in white velvet, blue feathers, and a veil thrown over.

Black coats, velvet waistcoats, for evening parties, are generally worn, by and are only slightly altered in their shape. Over the coat gentlemen wear a surtout in cloth of fine hazel; it must be very long and large waisted, and the skirt adapted with very little fulness. The sleeves easy, and without facings.

For evening, gentlemen wear cobourg lined with Scotch flannels. These cabans bear very well a capuche, and are then very comfortable.

PIANO CHAIR, EMBROIDERED IN TAPESTRY AND GOT UP IN ROSEWOOD.

Fashions are not merely connected with ladies' dresses, but they include all the novelties concerning the furniture and comforts of home. French style is particularly known for the exquisite taste and elegance which adorns houses in Paris; the greatest luxuries are spread through state apartments, and the most valuable delicacies surround ladies in their boudoir; that small, comfortable, snug room in which friends generally meet to exchange those conversations so very sparkling with wit. There, in the enjoyment of a bright fire and the comforts of a causeuse, all news of Court and town are sketched; all events,—must we say all scandal—are reported, every secret betrayed. Probably, a few directions from time to time on the French ameublements will please our fair subscribers as well as our toilet novelties.

We have engraved in the sketch of a Piano Chair, embroidered in tapestry, and got up in carved rosewood. For a long time, stools have been used for piano, but now that comfort for every hour of life, either study or pleasure, is become universally required, Piano Chairs are adopted, and Piano Arm Chairs are employed for Piano duets. The tapestry of the Piano Chair is worked on canvass No. 20. The plain ground of the seat is much better when worked in dark wool, au petit point (little stitch), the centre being in the middle: either the plain ground or the choice of the flowers must match the predominant colours of the room in which stands the Piano. Let us say, for illustrating our ideas, that is a room with red curtains, the plain ground of the Piano Chair ought to be black or blue, and the flowers red. In a room with yellow curtains, the ground of the Piano Chair ought to be violet or brown, with yellow and orange flowers. Tapestry work is reckoned to be very rich and handsome for all purposes in furniture. For window curtains (rideaux de croisée) and door curtains (portières), bands of velvet and tapestry have been employed with great success; and, although they are no novelty, still they are fashionable, and of very rich style. The bands must be embroidered on canvass No. 10. The embroidery is generally a garland of varied flowers, on a plain white ground. The plain ground must exceed the flowers by some stitches on the right and the left, and according to the height of the ceiling, the bands must be narrow or wide. The bands of velvet are cut of the same size, and are always chosen in dark shades—either dark green, violet, blue, or crimson. In France, we generally adopt the curtains on the doors (portières); they give at once a good style to the rooms, and are warm, and look comfortable.

COLLAR.

Embroidery has, in general, great attractions for ladies; they complete, so perfectly well, a morning toilet; the wearing of them is so lady-like that their fashion will never go out. At different periods they endeavoured to do without them, but the well-informed ladies always wore Jangeries, which partake of real elegance, and are the foundation of all dresses. The only objection that can be made to them is their high price, and the difficulty to procure them, except in the first-rate houses in London. But embroidering is such a pleasant work to do that all ladies and young ladies may willingly engage their leisure on them. We this day engrave a most charming pattern cut by the half. In joining the two parts you have a perfect accomplished collar. For embroidery choose a splendid muslin, and the very fine French embroidery cotton. For persons not knowing how to work the lace stitch they may apply a plain lace under the muslin, between the pattern and the muslin, and embroider over. Then cut the muslin according to the sketch in the vine leaves where the small points are drawn. In our next Number we shall give the pattern of the cuff.

PAPER RACKS EMBROIDERED WITH SILK, OR VELVET FLOWERS LAID ON.

For everything on which velvet is laid on, when it cannot be cut out with an instrument, it must be done in the following manner:—Trace the flower you wish to have in velvet on paper, and cut it out very carefully; gum the velvet on some very thin Persian silk; let it dry by putting it under a weight in a heavy book (not heavy enough to flatten the velvet); when it is dry, lay the flower that you have cut on the wrong side of the silk; draw the outline, cut it out of the velvet with very fine scissors, lay it on the card-rack, and fix it on by several stitches, large on the wrong side, and small on the right. Prepare all the flowers by fixing them in the same manner, and, when they are all laid on, fix them to the stuff by sewing round them all some excessively small flat braid; in sewing this braid, pass the needle through both the velvet and the stuff. All the stalks and the flowers which are too small to be cut out must be embroidered with silk.

To mount this, here are some instructions:—The three compartments shown in the drawing are cut apart, leaving enough stuff for a fold turning in; and are embroidered separately on a frame. The card is also cut separately, and the lining is gummed on the cardboard, and a piece to turn in is left. The cardboard which forms the bottom must be lined on both sides with the same stuff as the lining of the compartments. Care must be taken, before gumming this stuff, to fix firmly in the middle, near the top, the hook upon which the card-rack is to be hung. When the linings are all dry, the worked part is gummed on, proper care being taken that the work is neatly placed; then cut two long, thin pieces of cardboard, very thin at the bottom, and becoming larger, so to form the portfolio, which is laid on each side, from No 2 to the place where the pattern commences. Two smaller pieces of card are cut to lay on each side of the second compartment, and then two pieces of the same shape for the third compartment. On one side of these cards the lining is gummed; on the other, stuff similar to the card-rack, and they are sewn in such a manner as to join the compartments at the bottom by a stitch overcast. The second and third compartments are fixed to the lining at the bottom by stitches at a little distance from each other. It must be well understood that, before uniting the pieces, the right and wrong sides and the little pieces of card must be well gummed and prepared, and the hook solidly fixed. It is only then that the compartments can be mounted by overcasting them. To hide these stitches, gum all round the border a piece of suitable chenille. This mounting requires care and skill. By

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE

Mademoiselle Fuoco appeared on Thursday evening in a new ballet divertissement, entitled "L'Invitation à la Fête"—an agreeable entertainment, composed by Mr. Barnett, and aided by some very light and attractive music by M. Maretzek. The divertissement was produced some evenings ago, but had not the benefit of Mdlle. Fuoco's aid until Thursday evening. Her reception must have been very gratifying; and her performance of a pas de deux with a M. Tavystowski—or "Mr. Tavistock," as a little spectator near us pronounced his name—and a pas de genre, entitled "La Rondeja," was loudly applauded. The latter dance was generally encored, but a feeling of mercy for the dancers allowed her to escape with a graceful curtsey. "The Marriage of Figaro" is announced for this evening, when Miss Miran will appear as the Page.

PRINCESS'.

The engagement of Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport appears to have been a judicious one, as regards the interests of this establishment. On each night of their performance the theatre has been well attended, and the success of the Pantomime has caused it to be completely filled at half-price. On Wednesday evening we chanced to be present at the representation of "The Hunchback," and were well pleased at its performance. Mrs. Mowatt's Julia is a graceful and well-conceived interpretation of the character. In the scene with Clifford (Mr. Davenport) her acting made a great impression on the audience, well seconded as she was by the gentleman. Mr. Compton's Modus was, as may be expected, admirable; and Mr. Cooper, as Master Walter, certainly appeared to greater advantage than we have seen him for some time. Miss Emmeline Montague played Helen with very agreeable gaiety.

There can be no mistake about the excellence of the Pantomime, which continues to go with roars of laughter. The company play capitally together; and Mr. Flexmore is the King of Clowns. We never saw so much comical meaning conveyed by Pantomime.

A new drama, in three acts, is in preparation; in which Madame Anna Thillon will sustain a principal character.

OLYMPIC.

We question the judgment of Mr Gustavus Brooke, after his success in Othello, in making Sir Giles Overreach his second character in London. True it is, that many circumstances behind the curtain, with which we are unacquainted, may have led to this determination on his part; but, despite all professional inconveniences, we would rather have seen him in any other "trial" part, than that of the hero of "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," produced at this house on Monday evening. The character in itself is an exceedingly hazardous one, as regards the reputation of any actor not firmly established, indeed, Edmund Kean alone, in our own recollection, made an extraordinary effect in it; and the entire play is somewhat wearying, as well as ungrateful; all the striking interest being kept back until the fifth act, and that arising from circumstances with which audiences of the present day have little sympathy.

We do not mean by this, however, to decry Mr. Brooke's performance; we are only sorry that he did not choose some other more generally effective character; for there is no denying the fact that, even amongst his warmest admirers—and there were many in the house—the feeling was one rather of self-deceiving congratulation than triumph, when the play was over. That he is a great actor we have already given our opinion; we may also prophecy that he is destined to take the first position on our stage, if he has not already gained it; but, we repeat, that we are sorry he did not follow up the success achieved in his first part, by some other in which his peculiar excellences could have appeared to the best advantage. The chief points made, with one or two exceptions, depended more upon the interest of the dramatic situation than any great exhibition of passion or nature, except in the third act. And there the speech to the daughter, commencing—

"Virgin me no virgins!
I must have you lose that name, or you lose me," was so admirably given, as to draw down a loud and spontaneous burst of applause from every part of the house. The acting of Mr. Brooke, throughout the fifth act also, was of the highest order; and we doubt whether a more exquisite physical delineation than that of Sir Giles's frenzied fall and death, has ever been witnessed. Every working of his face—seen, apart from the colour required in Othello, for the first time—was a careful study; and his impotent rage, his choking utterance, and wild defiance, were conceived and given with inimitable and almost frightful truth. In this scene the feelings of the audience were wrought up to the highest degree of enthusiasm; and after he had been carried off, it was only with an ill-grace that they heard the rest of the play, which, by the way, it has ever struck us might be omitted with effect, bringing down the curtain upon the death of Sir Giles.

We cannot speak in very satisfactory terms of the general performance of the play. Mr. Brooke certainly laboured, as we have before stated, under the disadvantage of acting with a somewhat inefficient company. Of those who played with him, Mr. Holl, as Wellborn, and Mrs. Brougham, as Lady Allworth, are certainly entitled to the chief praise. Mr. Davidge's Marrall was an unequal performance—excellent at times, and then losing sight of all individuality, and apparently playing an entirely different part. These faults may, however, be improved on succeeding representations. Mr. Conquest, who played Justice Greedy, lacked the anxious anxiety of the gourmand for the welfare of the kitchen. A Miss Hill, whose name we do not remember to have seen before, appeared as Margaret. She spoke with propriety, and was careful and perfect, but her voice is against her.

Mr. Brooke was loudly recalled at the fall of the curtain, and received with a tumult of applause. The house was completely filled, and the great number of literary men and critics present showed the interest that is felt at present in his performance.

A Miss Glyn, who made her début here last week as a pupil of Mr. Charles Kemble, in Lucy Macbeth, failed completely. It is said that a Manchester audience had already pronounced a verdict upon her incapacity. The acting of the tragedy, altogether, was unsatisfactory. Mr Brooke having refused, and we think very properly, to play in it with an unrecognised actress

MR. MACGREGOR, M.P.

MR. MACGREGOR is most fitly elected for the great commercial city of Glasgow. He has had more influence on the commercial policy of the last seven years than many of those who occupy greater political reputations. Mr. Macgregor is the son of David Macgregor, of Drynie, Ross-shire, and is nearly related to the late Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the well-known traveller and discoverer. Mr. Macgregor was born at Stornaway, Ross-shire, in 1797. Like many of our most able and useful public men, Mr. Macgregor has been the architect of his own fortune. Having had occasion, in the prosecution of his private affairs, to travel much in British America, he acquired a great deal of information regarding the capabilities and leading interests of our possessions in that part of the world. This led to his being engaged to arrange with the Board of Trade several important colonial acts, and afterwards, in 1833, to his publishing, under the title of "British America," a work in two volumes, in which the result of his investigations and observations were set forth. So highly was the service prized which he had rendered by his researches to British North America, that these volumes were, by command, dedicated to William IV., "the only British Monarch that had ever visited that part of the empire." In 1832, Mr. Macgregor went on a mission to the Netherlands, which, though interrupted by the siege of Antwerp, ended in a treaty with Holland, which he drew up. In 1838 he was publicly employed in France. In the following year he went to Germany, and prevented a contemplated increase of duties. In 1835 and 1836 he was British Commissioner to the Court of Bavaria, at the time the Congress of the German Union was held there. During the years 1837 and 1838 he was British Commissioner at the Court of Vienna, and negotiated the treaty of commerce and navigation with Austria still in force. By this treaty, he obtained a removal of prohibitions and a diminution of duties on most articles of British manufacture and colonial produce. In 1839 he was joint Commissioner with Mr. Labouchere at Paris in obtaining a reduction of French duties on British goods; and in August of that year was sent on a diplomatic mission to the Court of Naples. Having obtained an abolition of the sulphur monopoly, and returned to this country in 1839, he was called to the post of Secretary to the Board of Trade, where he has been ever since. His "Commercial Statistics" is a valuable and stupendous work, embracing as it does a "Digest of the productive resources, commercial legislation, customs, and tariffs; navigation, port and quarantine laws and charges; shipping, imports and exports, and the moneys, weights, and measures of all nations." Mr. Macgregor's labours have been valued and acknowledged by most of the great statesmen of the day. Lord Palmerston, when speaking, on the 11th of February, 1839, of the commercial treaties with Austria and Turkey, used the following language: "I am bound to say that not only is great credit due to our Ambassadors, Sir Frederick Lamb and Lord Ponsonby, for the share they had in effecting these treaties, but Mr. Macgregor, who, under Sir Frederick Lamb, was employed in the negotiation at Vienna, and Mr. Bulwer, who, under Lord Ponsonby, was employed in the negotiations at Constantinople, also rendered very important services to the country." Sir Robert Peel, though belonging to a different political party, has repeatedly acknowledged the value and importance of Mr. Macgregor's services; and, without intruding unwarrantably into what was, of course, matter of private arrangement, it may be stated as a thing well enough understood, that to Mr. Macgregor's care were entrusted the details of the principal measures relating to the commerce of the country which Sir Robert Peel brought forward and carried.

Mr. Macgregor for some years held the office of Secretary to the Board of Trade jointly with Mr. Lefevre, son of the Speaker of the House of Commons. He resigned the situation when he stood for Glasgow. It may serve to show the appreciation which leading public men have of the range and value of Mr. Macgregor's commercial knowledge, to mention, that very recently, when the Committee on the Navigation Laws were settling the order of their procedure, Sir Robert Peel recommended that Mr. Lefevre should prepare himself for examination as to the changes which the Navigation Laws of this country had undergone, and that then the Committee should examine Mr. Macgregor as to what were the Navigation Laws of other States.

Mr. Macgregor, at a meeting held on Monday last, in favour of the removal of the Civil Disabilities of the Jews, entered into a statement of the condition of the Jews on the Continent. Even on this subject, his speech was statistical, as will be seen from the following extract:—

> With reference to what had been done by other countries in the case of the Jews, he might mention that, in Germany, there were about 80,000 who enjoyed parties civil liberty; and, as a Constitution had recently been granted by the King of Prussia to his subjects, our example would, in all likelihood, have a considerable influence on the position of the Jews in that country. In Austria, there were about 700,000 Jews, who possessed religious, but not civil liberty; and there, also, our example might operate for good. In France, Holland, and Belgium, the Jews enjoyed every civil and political privilege possessed by other subjects; and in the United States of America, they were also admitted to every privilege, and many of them were members of the Legislature of the various States; yet, he had never heard of those States being un-Christianised in consequence. He found, on minute inquiry, that, in Austria, the Jews, in the exercise of their charities, never made any distinction between Jews and Christians; and, with reference to the charge that they were always ready to overreach those with whom they dealt, his experience tended to quite a contrary result."

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER II.—SMITHFIELD.

IN no part of our great Metropolis can there be found so many characteristics of the old houses of London as in the neighbourhood of Smithfield. The courts and alleys about Cloth-fair, and behind Long-lane, are perfect labyrinths, and so full of ins and outs, that they astonish the stranger, who ventures to thread his way through them. Bartholomew's Church is also one of the very oldest in the City, and we never look upon its weather-beaten tower without recalling the scenes which have taken place, in that vast area which stretches out, before it.

The history of Smithfield has yet to be written: its jousts and tournaments, single combats, burnings, fairs, and markets, lie scattered over many volumes, and require the hand of some careful and clever collector to unite and bring them together.

There, in ancient times, the Marshal of England presided over the lists; and there, also, the mitred Bishops congregated to gaze upon the poor martyr who was burnt at the stake: that old church-tower has many a time glared redly as it was lit up by the blaze of those consuming fires; its vaulted roof has echoed back the clang of arms, when battle-axe and sword were clashed against helmet and shield, while scarcely a murmur arose from the lips of the mighty multitude that stood silent and breathless around the combatants.

Up Long-lane went the ancient Londoners from the west to reach the Fortune Theatre, which stood in Barbican. Shakespeare and Ben Jonson have, doubtless, passed through those old narrow courts which still surround Bartholomew's Church. It was to Smithfield where Bardolph went to buy a horse, which we know he would steal, if once allowed to get astride, and that, if any inquiries were made after it, at the Boar's Head, in Eastcheap, Falstaff would avouch for Bardolph's honesty. To us the whole neighbourhood is hallowed by a thousand poetical associations, and we never journey through it without feeling as if we were living again amid the Past—as for Bartholomew Fair, it is linked for ever with the name of dear Ben Jonson. To the thoughtful man it is a land of pleasant and solemn memories.

Even in the present day Smithfield is well worth visiting. There is something about its busy market unlike any other in England. Here buyers and sellers assemble from all corners of the country; and you hear the language of the provinces, and see the costumes of far-off counties, all spoken and worn at the same time, within the compass of that vast market-place. The eating-houses around Smithfield are also unlike any other in London. No where beside do you see set out such huge fat joints, or beheld such rich marrow puddings—the proprietors are well acquainted with the appetites of their customers. They know that they have to feed men who put a pound upon their plates at a time that they have come many a hungry mile through the open and breezy country, and brought ostrich-like stomachs, which are capable of digesting coarse beef and solid thing they devour.

But watch one of those drovers, after his cattle are safely penned, blow off the froth from a full pot of ale, and drink. You can fairly trace the current as it rolls down his throat, as though it gurgled down long, deep, and vast; you wonder how ever the fellow can hold his breath. If he does not empty the whole pot at a draught, he will not have enough in the bottom to drown a mouse. He brought in his throat the dust of many a weary mile; and, when you recal the shouting and hallooing which is so necessary in driving his cattle, you marvel not that he feels as thirsty as a lime-burner. Nor does his dog lose a moment before he visits the adjoining cab-stand, where he makes friends with the waterman, and, like his master, quenches his thirst. No dogs are more sagacious than those which have been well trained by a Smithfield drover—a look or a motion is sufficient to direct them this way or no telling to drive the sheep aside when a vehicle is passing, or run away needs no pointing out to them: they are up and over the backs of the whole flock in a moment; and, having placed the deserter again in marching order, the side of the master is once more their post. As they look into his face you might, from their actions, fancy that they read his very thoughts, and foresaw his wishes. Many of these men love their dogs as dearly as their children, and well do the faithful animals return such affection. We have seen a drover asleep on the pavement in summer, with his dog coiled up beside him, and ready to spring upon the first assailant who could be found bold enough to disturb his owner's slumber. The watchfulness of the dog and the attitude of the sleeper would have delighted the eye of a Landseer.

To our ears there is something pleasant in the lowing and bleating sounds that fill Smithfield on a market-day—they carry us away into the green quietude of the country, and we cannot look upon the flocks and herds without conjuring up the sloping hills and pastoral vallies from whence they have been driven. They call up images of homesteads and thatched granges, far off amid the dreamy murmur of open fields, where even the smell of the smoke has a pleasant aroma, and the dust on the road-side a clean look. Somehow, we seem to dislike seeing the little white lambs imprisoned in those strong and crowded pens; there is a pitiable plaintiveness about their bleat, which tells that they are not kindly used—as if they felt it hard to be driven away from the young round daisies which were just beginning to peep forth—that they missed their merry gambols on the breezy upland, and pined for their range over the wide and open fields. With an old or middle-aged sheep we have no such sympathy—it has lived until it has grown into maturity, and become as great an ornament to the table as it once was to the field. What a beautiful expression may sometimes be found in the face of an heifer, with its large mild eyes and finely moulded head. Let any one walk down the foot-way on a Monday, between the posts to which they are secured, and he will be struck by the calm and patient countenances of many of the cattle. Nor is their colour less admirable. What a rich glossiness do we find about the red and black patches; while the white portions look clean and spotless as untrodden snow.

In fact, in the world can there be found such exquisite assemblage of cattle as Smithfield presents on a full market-day. A foreigner wonders no longer at the thews and sinews of Englishmen, after he has seen the substantial material on which they feed. A drover with his sharp-lash knob in his hand, and a mountain of beef before him, is no bad emblem of merry John Bull's bulwarks.

We have often wondered if the inhabitants around Smithfield ever sleep on a Sunday night; to us it has seemed impossible to close the eyes amid such an uproar as is then heard. Babel was never shaken by a greater confusion of sounds—the barking of a hundred dogs blend with the halloing of a hundred drovers—sheep, whose number is legion, join in the chorus; then comes the deep bass of the bullocks, mingled with the shrill squealing of swine—a sound which sets the very teeth on edge—and this loud concert is kept up without ceasing, until day opens its broad eyes in the east. Should the unwilling listener—worn out—begin to doze about the dawn, up comes the thunder of scores of butchers' carts, making the old casements chatter again, and causing the houses to jar to their very foundations. Night is not a season of rest in this ancient neighbourhood.

Many of those Smithfield butchers can tell to a few pounds what a bullock will weigh, by only looking at it; you will see them walk once leisurely round, more for a few brief seconds, then make an offer; should the seller agree that it will weigh so much to the quarter, they are ready on the spot to take them own judgment with a five-pound note. They seem to carry their scales in their eyes, to lift up the bullock and weigh him by only raising their eyelids; as to sheep and pigs, we believe some of them would be ready to bet that they guessed the weight to a few ounces.

But Friday is the great day to see Smithfield, if a stranger wishes to peep at a few of our real London characters. Such a motley group as is there congregated can never be found together in any other spot in the metropolis. There the costermonger shows the paces of his donkey, and the dustman forces his broken-kneed jade into a trot, while the knacker looks on with eye intent, selecting out such as he feels confident will have to be carried home. What trading, and running, and trotting to and fro, is there to be seen! You wonder what secret the men possess to get such poor and broken-down horses to go at the speed they do. True, one or two fall now and then; but that, of course, is always the fault of the pavement, as they say. It puzzles you to see them dispose of animals that possess so many excellent qualities. Only to listen, you might fancy that the poor horse, which seems to stand with so much difficulty, could draw St. Paul's if it were loose; that "Eclipse" was hardly to be named beside it for speed; and as for eating (the most wonderful of all), its keep costs less than nothing. Should the horse have swollen legs, they assign a reason, and swear it is a proof of its great strength; should the bones show through the skin, it is tough and wiry; if broken-winded, it has only caught a slight cold. In short, they have a good for every evil, and would beat your practised horse-dealers hollow—even if they came from Yorkshire.

One, whose hair peeps through his cap, has thrown an old bridle around his neck, and this he recommends as better than new, because it has got seasoned. A second, whose ragged suit would not fetch a crown were he to try all Petticoat-lane, has an old saddle to dispose of; you see the hay it is stuffed with peeping out at a dozen openings. Another, having got rid of his donkey, wants a purchaser for his cart, which you favour from the look of the wheels, he must have brought thither on his head. Some are trying to reconcile their whips to the load they are ever making within a few inches of your ear; while others gather in little knots round a celebrated trotter, and listen with delight at the distance he has "done" in his day. And over every bargain that is made, the huge pewter pot is filled and emptied, or the fiery gin chucked down at a single swallow.

Some we have seen—driven doubtless by hard necessity to sell—part with their favourite animal, with a full heart and a tearful eye; and on one occasion we saw a poor sweep kiss the forehead of his donkey, and when it was led away he heaved such a sigh as would have caused Sterne to have hugged his "innocent blackness."

We have often wondered into what sort of holes and corners these poor over-worked and ill-fed horses are thrust by their owners. We have peeped about into all kinds of strange places where we have seen the cart of the costermongers standing, but, for the life of us, we have never been able to see or hear of their wheeled "chattels." True, we have occasionally seen them enter doors, and go into houses; but whether they were occupiers of the ground-floor, or the ground in the back-yard, we have only in a few cases arrived at a satisfactory conclusion. Once we were bold enough to ask a rough-looking fellow, with a most awful squint, what he did with his donkey when he got it inside, and he answered, "Make a pillow of it, to be sure."

Beside its cattle, Smithfield has its hay market; and we have many a time wondered, while reading the names of the places on the carts and wagons, at the great distance from whence they have come. Sometimes the whole space is perfumed like a hay-field, telling to us a sad tale of some poor farmer who has been compelled to bring the produce of his little field to market, before the smell of the sweet grasses had died away. Nor less melancholy is it to witness some old countryman driving his cow and calf before him, and looking around with astonishment, in the cold grey of the early morning, on the high house and the busy scene. Oh! how different to the dim repose of his own humble cottage. You see care in his very countenance, and know that there is some unwritten history of poverty and trouble that compels him to make such a sacrifice.

It was once our lot to meet such a character in the open area of Smithfield. Time had silvered his hair, but left a ruddy and youthful bloom upon his patriarchal countenance. He had driven his beautiful cow and calf into their allotted place, and stood with a short clean pipe in his hand, as if wondering how he should obtain a light: no doubt his morning pipe had been to him a source of comfort. He glanced a moment at the cigar we were smoking, but was too modest to ask for a light; it was no desire, as extra smoke, to ask such a thing, and we offered him the fiery end, which glowed like charcoal. He "lonted not low," but made a bow that would have done honour to a herald. It required but little trouble to get him to enter into conversation; he had set out long before midnight; had driven his cow and calf above twenty miles, from a beautiful village in Surrey, and was about to sell them, to purchase the discharge of his son, who was a soldier, at Chatham. We turned away with a sad heart, for a tear gathered in the old man's eye as he ended his simple narrative; and we thought that Smithfield still contained its martyrs. Once, also, we saw a young gipsy mother and her sickly child, standing silently beside her ass: she had brought it to market to sell, to release her husband from the prison in which he was committed for poaching. But many a market in England is attended by such sufferers as these beside Smithfield.

If this great market, like Bartholomew Fair, is doomed to be swept away, Smithfield will be shorn of its glory, and the old houses left to mourn in silence and solitude. A horned and agile bullock is not the most fitting object to rush through our crowded thoroughfares, to the terror of pretty nursery-maids and little children. But, as the inimitable Matthews said, "We cannot take a hackney-coach for it," nor could such a danger be got rid of without great injury to many of the old inhabitants whose very bread depends upon the market. It is a question or "pitch and toss whether the few are to be tossed up or the many tossed down? whether it is better for a few Jones's and Smiths to be thrown occasionally over the battlements of Blackfriars-bridge, or the eating-house-keepers and tavern-keepers about Smithfield are to give up boiling, baking, and brewing. It is fat joints, marrow puddings, and everybody's Entire, with no end of etceteras in the form of tollage, against the lives and limbs of her Gracious Majesty's liege subjects. As the boys say, "if heads will fly," we think the former way of it will prevail nearly hide "Eskin" in the wild. Whatever way it may, the poetry of old Smithfield will still remain.

Fat Ursula, who sold roasted pig, still lives in the pages of Rare Old Ben, and while his works exist the memory of Bartholomew Fair will never be forgotten. Its old buildings, and unique characters, are numbered amongst the things that were. The merry din of ancient days will never resound again through the Bars of Smithfield. The archers, who made it their great mustering ground, have ages ago shot their last shaft. Death stept in and struck through the target, and they never again appeared. What visions of the past float before us while wandering around the old borders of Smithfield! What pictures have perished for ever that once glowed in all the colours of life upon that wide-spread canvass! Kings and heroes and martyrs—processions of solemn monks hymning along their way moved beneath the frowny-looking archway—figures of brutal and bearded men who fed the reddening fires—shrieks and groans that pierced through the star-paved floors of Heaven—and curses that went deep and hollow into the nethermost depths of dark perdition.

In the early morning, alone, have we traversed that solemn neighbourhood, when neither the stir of trade nor traffic disturbed the silence. And at such times the Past has seemed again to open its silent doors, and the phantoms of the departed dead to glide before us. Battle and banner have again paled the sickly light streaming through the fancy pane Wat Tyler fell, struck down by the arm of the powerful Mayor of London. Then came the shadow of the King who had broken his faith with the brave rebel, flying before his murderers. The Bastard of Burgundy and Earl Rivers next passed with their visors down, and paused on the spot where the latter was beheaded. Then the Tudors moved into the open area, to gaze upon the scene that there fought. We saw pale faces unraised amid the flames—lips silent, yet moving with inward prayer. The ancient watch passed by, half buried in the smoke of their burning cresset. Then the sweet Rosalind moved slowly along the dusky archway, and was lost in the shadow of the old church. Then the morning sun fell upon a gay bridal party: they entered the low porch, and the door that opened into the gable-ended overhanging mansion was closed upon them for ever.

The high wall now stands upon the dust of her millions of sons and daughters, who have ages ago sunk into the earth from whence they sprung. Even into the ancient church of Bartholomew itself we have now to descend as we enter—the remains of the forgotten dead have risen but a portion of the floor: the youth and beauty of departed years are but a portion of the dark mould which rises around the hoary edifice.

> They loved, but whom they loved the grave
> Hath lost in its mysterious womb;
> Oh! they were fair, but nought could save
> Their beauty from the tomb.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday). A fair average quantity of English wheat has been received up to our market this week, constwise, as well as by land carriage, and the show of samples of last week's-day was tolerably good as to attendance of buyers was small, and the weather very damp, the demand for all kinds of wheat, of home produce, was heavy, and to have effected large sales realize more than could have been substituted to. # ROMAN VILLA DISCOVERED IN LOWER THAMES-STREET.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE REMAINS OF THE ROMAN VILLA, ON THE SITE OF THE NEW COAL EXCHANGE.

ROMAN VILLA DISCOVERED IN LOWER THAMES-STREET.

A discovery of the greatest interest to the London antiquary was made on Wednesday week, in digging for the foundations of the Coal Exchange, exactly opposite Billingsgate Market. The City antiquaries had been expecting for some time previous, that, when the excavations reached a considerable depth, interesting exhumations might be developed, from the circumstance of Roman tiles and fragments being occasionally turned up by the workmen. Their anxiety might, as heretofore, have proved unavailing, but for the laudable taste and feeling of Mr. Bunning, the City Surveyor, who, having luckily noticed the remains as soon as they were uncovered, stayed the work of removal, and communicated with Mr. Thomas Lott, a gentleman well known for his public and private efforts to save the City antiquities from that wholesale destruction to which for many years they have been subjected. Mr. Bunning's exertions were so promptly responded to, that, in the course of a day or two, drawings and plans were made, and the discovery actually discussed at a meeting of the British Archæological Association last Friday, accompanied by sketches of the remains, by their draughtsman, F. W. Fairholt, F.S.A.

The portion of the house uncovered consists but of two rooms; the greater part of the building running beneath warehouses which are not destined for removal. The ground of this portion is the property of the Grocers' Company, and it is to be hoped they will permit further excavations. Most likely, that portion of the tessellated room hitherto uncovered encloses in its centre one of those gorgeous designs in coloured tesseræ, such as our readers may remember were discovered beneath the Hall of Commerce, in Threadneedle-street, and which may now be viewed with increased interest in their resting-place, the British Museum.

The extreme length of the ruins uncovered, is about fifteen yards. The walls are composed of the ordinary flat Roman tiles in regular layers, varied occasionally by a course of pale yellow tiles, and are about three feet four inches in thickness. These walls enclose a room hitherto only opened to the extent of twenty-three feet in length, by eight in breadth, which is paved with small red tesseræ; they have been made from the plain tiles, and also from the scored flue-tiles, traces of the ornament upon which are occasionally visible on their surface. They are laid upon a concrete composed of quicklime, sand, and pounded tiles, with a mixture of small stones. To the right of this apartment is a doorway which leads into some other room, as yet unopened, at the back of the seat seen in the semicircular apartment adjoining. This latter apartment has had its walls destroyed at some very early period, except a fragment which appears beside the seat. But, from vestiges remaining, it would seem that the semicircular wall was formed of Kentish rag-stones; thus affording a contrast to the other portion of the building. The floor of this room is composed like the former, with the exception of the tesseræ; for it seems to have been merely strewn with pounded tile.

Beneath the floor appears a Hypocaust, formed of columns about two feet in height, each consisting of 14 tiles about twelve inches square. These are connected at top by larger tiles, which form the substructure of the floor. Flue-tiles, with varied patterns incised on their surfaces, have been discovered, and which originally conveyed warm air up the sides of the building. The site of the Furnace has not yet been made known. A seat, constructed entirely of Roman brick, and wide enough to accommodate two persons, appears on one side of the flat wall of this room.

These remains are about thirteen feet below the level of Thames-street, and are singularly interesting from the circumstance of their foundation being laid upon wooden piles driven into the marshy land which at the time of their construction existed on this spot. A spring of clear water bursts from beneath the walls. The strata of different epochs are shown to great advantage by the present excavations, and, without a great stretch of the imagination, a spectator can form some notion of the features of this district before the civilizing hand of the Roman colonist reclaimed the site from the water, and rendered it habitable, and the chief seat of commerce in Roman Britain.

Our Engravings are copied from the Sketches by Mr. Fairholt, already alluded to; and have been drawn by him upon the wood. The largest Cut exhibits a general view of the excavations to the left of the spectator is seen the Tower of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East; the hoarding to the right is on the level of Thames-street, and erected to enclose the excavations. Our other large Cut exhibits the Roman remains only, showing the two rooms, with the outer walls. The piles upon which the foundations are laid are seen, and the comparatively modern circular shaft of a stone dry well will be noticed in the centre of that room with the pavement of square tesseræ. The semicircular room, with the Seat and the Hypocaust beneath, are exhibited in one of our smaller Cuts. The other Cut exhibits some of the fragments which have been discovered by the workmen. In the foreground is a Roman flue-tile, with a pattern deeply indented on its upper surface a different pattern appearing on the under one. The large jug in the centre is comparatively modern: it is of red glazed pottery, with a granular white pattern on it; lions' heads project on each side, which are perforated for a string or any other mode of suspension: it is probably not older than the 15th century. The lid of a Roman vase of black earth, and a flat Roman tile with a simple pattern, appear behind, and afford an average example of the remains discovered in the debris which has so long covered this interesting relic of Roman London.

THE ROMAN REMAINS.

White Woodcock.—On Friday last, Mr. Morgan Davies, of Cwm Ivor, near Llandilo, shot a very beautiful Scolopax Rusticola Alba—it was about the size of the common woodcock, and the feathers were perfectly white, with the exception of a brown rim round the base of the bill. The day previous a party of gentleman had fired ineffectually more than a dozen shots at this rara avis, but fortune reserved him for the unerring tube of Mr. Davies.

The late Major Baker, of the 73rd Foot.—This officer, whose melancholy death at the hands of the Kaffirs, with four of his companions, has been recently noticed in this paper, was a near relative of the Duke of Leinster. He had been connected with the regiment since 1831, and obtained his majority so recently as the November in the past year. During the past 15 months nine British officers have been slain in cold blood by these merciless barbarians.

Miss Ann Thomasin, of Birmingham, has bequeathed to each of the following charitable institutions in that town a legacy of £50, viz., the General Hospital, the Dispensary, and the Eye Infirmary; also £50 to the poor men and women who go to St. Philip's Church, to be paid to them by one of the clergymen; and £10 to the Sunday School of St. Philip's. Her will is dated as far back as the year 1826, and she died on the 2nd Nov. last. She had, at various times, sealed and appended around her will six codicils, so arranged as to fold up like a pocket-map, and when extended covered four feet square.

Misery in Flanders.—An idea of the misery, from the want of means to obtain a livelihood, which pervades Flanders, may be formed from the following statement in the Messager de Gand:—There were in 1847, at Thielt, 642 deaths to 302 births; at Ardoyne, 440 to 124; at Meulebeke, 80 to 176; at Ecternghem, 264 to 52; at Wynghene, 440 to 129; and a hundred of communes present the same afflicting picture

THE IMPERIAL PRINCIPLE.

In the late debate on the situation of the West Indian Colonies, Mr. Disraeli laid down one of those axioms with which he occasionally surprises the unreflecting listeners into the belief that he has uttered a profound truth. He asserted that England as a nation has abandoned "the imperial principle" of government for the "commercial" one, and may, therefore, we suppose, expect the miseries due to those who forsake a noble and magnificent theory for that which is base and sordid. The word "imperial" conveys an idea of splendour, of sceptres and crowns, of boundless power and command; "commerce," on the other hand, gives a vulgar notion of buying and selling, of struggles for profit, of calculation of cost, which is in itself a weakness which imperial governments to do them justice, are far above. The results of commerce, national wealth, employment, and comfort, are certainly desirable enough; but the process is hateful, and in every way to be despised. Let no senate, on peril of "sinking into a counting-house," be guided by the "commercial principle."

Such is the lesson enforced by the author of "Tancred." As he is an oracle with his party, many of whom class his utterances with "the words of the wise and their dark sayings," this, his latest inspiration, is worth a little dissecting. We may otherwise be accepting an epigram for a theory and mistake verbal antithesis for political wisdom. The same qualities that make a man great on a small subject may grievously mislead when dealing with questions wide and vast as the world itself. In holding up to ridicule the inconsistencies, the changes of policy, even the personal manners, of a Minister, Mr. Disraeli has not his equal; there is a smartness in his well-prepared sarcasms. But this, after all, is but a small talent; the principles that should sway the varied interests of the world are above or beyond its sphere.

The "Imperial Principle" we presume to mean Government of Authority, more or less modified, that does not stoop to calculate the worth of a possession by its contribution to the national wealth. The "Commercial Principle" is that which applies to all measures the test of utility; it questions the advantage of vast territories, if they are not capable of being turned to some use—of colonies, if they furnish no traffic; it states the end of Government to be the happiness and comfort of mankind, not the gratification of personal pride and lust of power. It has no reluctance to change the sword of sway for the ledger of profit, believing that by the test of prosperity we must judge the efficacy of all policies. It may seem degrading that a Senate should "sink into a counting house"; but it would have been well for Europe, the world, and the whole human race, if half the common sense the counting-house requires had been applied to politics. We should have allowed other nations the freedom we have always taken ourselves of changing the forms of Government at will; we should have kept out of the old absurd wars of succession, which have cost us millions, without producing one result; we should have refused those profligate subsidies to worthless allies, who swindled us in every possible way after taking our cash. We should not have constituted ourselves the universal meddler in all the quarrels of Europe, paying for everybody, and fighting for all, with a recklessness that has no parallel in any other nation. Our terrible debt, that weighs on every one, making life more difficult to all classes, is principally the result of the "Imperial principle," carried out to an extent unknown even in states where the power is truly Imperial or Absolute.

The anomaly is all the stronger, because for three centuries England has been a great commercial nation, though governed on the "Imperial" theory. The wealth acquired by trade and manufactures has been wasted in supporting dynasties and families! This is the true instinct of Imperialism; the "Commercial" principle rather develops the strength of the masses, irrespective of who may rule them. The race of the Bourbons alone has cost England more in solid gold than would have drained all our cities, and placed a good education within the reach of every child in the country. The money is gone; we are loaded with debt; we are only beginning to think of sanatory measures; our great centres of population are sunk in ignorance and vice; and where are the Bourbons, for whom we have wasted the treasures that might have been so well employed? They have either been hurled by their people from the thrones on which our bayonets placed them, or they sit there amid the curses and execrations of their subjects, who are daily compelling them, however, to abdicate some portion of that power which constitutes the "Imperial principle" we are told to cherish and reverence.

We select the Bourbon family as an instance of what a system can be built upon the "Imperial principle;" for that race, who really seem sent into the world to be a shame and humiliation to mankind, we have sacrificed more than as a State we have ever had the heart to spend on the greatest national or social objects. For them we have reversed all the rules that guided us in our internal policy. To keep a Catholic Bourbon on the Throne of France, we engaged in a war with thirty millions of people, who held his very name in abhorrence; sinking millions in the struggle, at the very time our own subjects of the same religion were not recognised as citizens, and excluded from all offices and places of trust. Nothing but the "Imperial principle" could reconcile such a glaring inconsistency; in England our Government was narrowly and exclusively Protestant; on the Continent our blood and gold were poured out for the support of the Roman Catholic Church and Sovereign. In Spain we acted the same absurdity over again.

The result of the whole Peninsular War was the establishment on the throne of Ferdinand, the most bigoted of Catholic Kings, who would willingly have established the Inquisition, if he could; and, while we were fighting at Vittoria, and Badajos, and Salamanca, to restore to the Monarchy and Clergy of Spain all their ancient predominance, we were battling with equal obstinacy, at home, against the smallest concessions to our own fellow-citizens of the same faith. How the future historian will reconcile the lavish votes of money to build up the Catholic Church in Spain with the votes of the same body against recognising the rights of Catholic citizens in the United Kingdom, we cannot tell; it is one of the strangest political contradictions presented by all history; but it is explained by the operation of the "Imperial principle;" it is essentially government according to the will or theory of the go-

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

Our private letters state that the King was in good general health, but that his Majesty coughed a good deal on Monday. The proverbial equanimity of his temper was said to be giving way before the excitement and accumulation of public affairs.

The Chamber of Deputies commenced, on Monday, the discussion on the paragraph of the Address in which the King expressed a hope that the agitation excited by hostile passions and blind delusion would disappear before public reason, enlightened by free discussion and by the manifestation of legitimate opinions.

M. Duvergier de Hauranne said that it had pleased the Cabinet, despite of all constitutional rules, to accuse the intentions of upwards of 100 deputies who had figured at the Reform banquets. The Opposition was not afraid of being belied by the country, however the ministerial majority might decide, in declaring that those réunions were perfectly legal, and that the Minister of the Interior had committed an illegality in prohibiting them. MM. Guizot, Salvandy, and de Broglie had repeatedly proclaimed them legal, and M. Guizot had set the example of such manifestations at the celebrated banquet of Lisieux. Eighteen years ago France had effected a revolution, not with a view to replace a dynasty by another, but to substitute the reality of the Constitutional Government for the arbitrary rule of the Restoration. M. Guizot and his colleagues, he was sorry to say, had forgotten both the revolution and its causes. Both he and his friends would, however, notwithstanding the ill-will of Ministers, persevere in the course they had adopted, and continue to oppose agitation to corruption. M. Gnenault vindicated the conduct of the Government.

The Union Monarchique avows that the French Government, alarmed at the movement in favour of Parliamentary Reform, has resolved to assume the initiative, on condition that the proposed concessions shall not be discussed by the Chamber of Deputies until next year. We much doubt the accuracy of the statement.

The Moniteur publishes a Royal ordinance, authorising the free importation of zinc, in a raw state, or in pigs, for the purpose of being converted into plates, agreeably to the conditions stipulated by the 8th article of the law of 6th July, 1836. The importation may take place, by sea and by land, in French vessels or in those of the country to which the metal was extracted. Another ordinance provides that the stipulations of the Royal ordinances of the 21st of May, 1845, the 29th November, 1846, and 30th January, 1847, relative to the temporary importation, in French vessels, of rice, raw tartar, madder roots, seed of colza, and cork in a rough state, intended to be re-exported after undergoing a certain preparation, shall be applicable to the same articles by the vessels of the countries of which they are the produce. A third Royal ordinance permits the temporary and free importation of seeds of sesame and linseed, by land or by sea, in French vessels or in those of countries where they are grown, in order to be converted into oil, and re-exported.

The debate on the Reform Dinners took place on Tuesday, and exclusively occupies the papers of Wednesday. The speech of Marie Odilon Barrot—considered one of the best he ever pronounced—had created a considerable sensation in Paris, particularly that part of it in which he expressed his sorrow that a Government originating in a revolution should have recourse to acts of repression which the Government overturned by that revolution had never attempted

It was generally stated, that if the Ministerialists should, as was threatened, refuse a hearing to the Opposition Deputies, and thus put an end to the discussion, the Liberal Deputies, to the number of 60 or 80, would resign their seats en masse.

The apprehensions that the debate would terminate unpleasantly, produced a considerable fall in the funds.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples of the 31st ultimo, put us in possession of the highly important fact, that order and tranquility were restored in that capital "To retract now would be impossible for the King," says one of the letters. "His Majesty quote the words of his illustrious parent to General Pepe upon accepting the Constitution in 1821 'This time I am sincere.'"

His Majesty has found himself compelled, by the force of public opinion, to give the Neapolitans a Constitution. The decree coming with was issued on the 28th ult., when the excitement of the people had risen to such a pitch that it was no longer safe for the Royal bagot to refuse.

The National Guard had been already brought into action, although armed only with fowling-pieces and such weapons as could be improvised, in which cudgels were included. The lazzaroni proceed, it seems, turbulently, and require coercion. Parties were attacked and ill-treated by them. In the vicinity of the Custom house a young man had a cockade torn from his coat by a lazzarone, but the act being seen by a National Guard, he was immediately seized, and the lazzarone drew a knife, whereupon the National Guard transfixed him with his bayonet, and killed him on the spot. The Liberal party, who lately had the Government to contend against, had now, it seems, the most ignorant and brutal people to cope with.

The King was very popular. On the 30th he drove through the streets of Naples in an open carriage, accompanied by the Queen, and unattended by any escort. His Majesty was received with universal applause.

In the evening of the same day the King and Queen appeared in the Royal box at the San Carlo, and met with a most enthusiastic reception. The house was full to excess. The pit and amphitheatre were occupied, that of the national police, Del Carretto Seats were let for three times their regular price. On the Royal party entering their box, one universal shout of "Long live the Constitutional King" burst from the entire house. Similar demonstrations took place between the acts.

On the night of the 30th the city was patrolled by the National Guard, accompanied by small detachments of cavalry. There was no disorder. The enthusiasm was unbounded. At balls and private parties, the ladies were tricolor cockades instead of flowers in the hair.

On the afternoon of the 31st the city had resumed its usual aspect, and all was calm. The lazzaroni were quiet, and apparently a new era of liberty has commenced for Naples

It was said that the King was averse to granting a separate Parliament and Government to Sicily, but was willing that the Chambers should be assembled alternately at Naples and Palermo.

The first decrees of the King in favour of reform failed to calm the popular effervescence. A new insurrection was expected at Messina. On the 24th, General Nunziante entered the Strada Ferdinande, at the head of his column, when he drew up in a line, with the cannons pointed and match lighted. This demonstration forbid in its object and the people having manifested their discontent, it was for an instant dreaded that a struggle might ensue. However, the troops returned to their barracks, without there having occurred the least loss of blood on either side Both officers and soldiers swore they would not again expose themselves in a similar manner. General Cardamone and the Duke de Bagnoli, attendant of Messina, both blamed this provocation. It is said Catania was in insurrection on the 26th, and it was reported that Cartagirone, Cartagirette, and Milazzo, were about to follow its example. The whole Island seemed ready to rise. Let us hope that the proclamation of the Constitution of the King of Naples will put a stop to this effervescence, and that at the moment a new horizon appears to open upon the Two Sicilies, civil war will no longer continue to desolate this fine country.

Up to the date of the latest communication no official intelligence had been received from Palermo; but, according to information generally credited, it had been ascertained that the Royal troops had surrendered the Fort de Castellamare, after a bloody combat. Those who had escaped retreated to the camp of General Gaeset. On the 30th a steamer arrived at Naples with 200 wounded soldiers; other steamers were sent to bring back the troops still at Palermo, and bearing orders to abandon the city. It appears that the only means trusted to to reduce the island will be negotiation. On the 29th the Constitution was announced at Messina, and on the 30th at Palermo

Great excitement prevailed in Piedmont, produced on the one hand by reports of aggressive demonstrations making in Austrian Lombardy, and on the other by the news of the proclamation of the constitution of Naples Various regiments were ordered to proceed from Turin and Genoa to Alessandria, by forced marches. The appointment of Count Radetzki as generalissimo of an invasion on the part of the Austrian Commander-in-Chief to seize suddenly and unexpectedly on Alessandria, which is one of the most important fortified places in Northern Italy.

The King of Sardinia, having reason to suspect that Austria was desirous to occupy the fortress of Alessandria (belonging to Piedmont), has directed that it should be placed in a state of defence. The Lega Italienne of Genoa, of the 31st ult., mentions the arrival of an express from Turin during the previous night, with orders for the Regiment Regina to proceed forthwith by forced marches to Alessandria. A regiment of cavalry, and several batteries of artillery, were also under marching orders for that city. The same journal announces that the police of Milan had given notice that the railroad from Milan to Treviglio would be closed for the public on the 30th, 31st, and 1st of February, being exclusively reserved on those days for the conveyance of Austrian troops

It is rumoured that the King of Sardinia had determined on granting a Constitution to his subjects.

On the arrival of the news from Naples at Genoa a popular demonstration took place, and exclamations were everywhere heard in favour of a Constitution for Piedmont.

The Alba of Florence states that the effective force of the Neapolitan Army consisted of 29,068 men, namely, 60,465 under arms, reserve, 4,800 [illegible] Navy 2325. The above figures include the troops in Sicily. The Army is composed of 171 men.

Letters from Rome referring to the state of feeling in that city relative to the turn taken by affairs in Sicily, mention that the people go out for miles to meet the courier on the Via Appia, and extraordinary supplements are issued hourly by the newspapers. The poltroonery of the Neapolitan forces, and the determined conduct of the Sicilian men and women, are the theme of all circles

Letters from Florence of the 31st announce that the Neapolitan steamer Neptune, having M. Del Carretto on board, had sailed for Santanza, where the exile expected he would be safe. From there it was expected the voyage would be continued to some port of France, but the ultimate destination was unknown.

SPAIN

From Madrid we learn that General Serrano returned to Almeria on the 24th ult, from the expedition to the Chafarinas Islands. The weather at Madrid had become milder, and the influenza was on the decline.

Our accounts from Madrid are of the 26 instant. The Court had gone into mourning for a fortnight on the occasion of the death of the King of Denmark. The Committee on the Estimates was to present its report to the Chamber of Deputies in a few days, and the discussion was to commence immediately afterwards.

Espartero had paid a visit to the theatre on the 31st ult., and his reception had been most enthusiastic. The moment he presented himself in his box, the entire audience stood up, uncovered, and applauded him; and the ladies in the boxes joined in the general enthusiasm, waving their handkerchiefs, &c. The applause was only interrupted by the representation of the piece, it being renewed during the intervals between the acts. From the boxes issued, at intervals, beautiful pigeons with ribands round their necks, to which were attached tickets and papers, in which compliments and expressions of welcome were addressed to the General, who, as they entered his box, distributed them to the ladies who were near him.

GERMAN STATES

Wurtemburg.—The Second Chamber of the States of Wurtemburg presented to the King, on the 31st ult., its Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The Chamber assures the King of its fidelity and attachment, and the confidence that it reposes in his Majesty. The King thanked the Chamber for its assurances, and repeated his declarations of an earnest desire to contribute to the welfare and happiness of his people. His Majesty added that he was anxious to see the Chamber occupy itself with a law for the better regulation of the public press.

SWITZERLAND

Letters from Berne of the 4th inst. mention that the Diet ordered on that day an equality to be instituted into the conduct of the Members of the Council of War of the Sonderbund, for the purpose of ascertaining which of them had been guilty of high treason, by calling foreign intervention to assist the armed resistance against the decrees of the Diet. By the second article of the decree the Diet recommended all the Cantons of the Sonderbund to grant a general amnesty, from which the above traitors should alone be excluded.

UNITED STATES.

The New York and the Waterloo, Capt. Allen, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, with dates from New York of the 17th. The former vessel brings 219,000, and the latter 227,000.

The most important piece of intelligence by this arrival is the fact that, on the 14th, the President had ordered a court of inquiry for the purpose of investigating the charges against Gen. Pillow and Col. Duncan, which had been preferred by Gen. Scott. After that investigation is terminated, the court is further directed to inquire into the charges preferred against Gen. Scott by Gen. Worth. The charges against Gen. Worth, transmitted by the Commanding General, have been dismissed by the President The court is directed to assemble at Perote, at as early a day as the members can convene. It is to consist of Gen. Towson, Paymaster-General, as President, and Gen. Cushing, and Gen. Butler, of Louisana. Gen. Towson will start for Mexico immediately. The selection of Gen Towson is an anomaly in court-martials, and will doubtless lead to much difficulty His office of Paymaster-General is a civil one, which might be conferred upon any individual in private life, and he holds no rank in the regular line of the army. The command of the army in Mexico would necessarily devolve on Gen. Butler; and as he is the senior officer next in rank to Gen Scott, whose presence would be required at the court of inquiry. The idea of recalling Scott had been abandoned for the present.

The proceedings in Congress on the 14th, produced no result; but the opposition press seem sanguine in their hopes of the rejection of the Ten Regiments Bill It was vehemently opposed in Senate by Mr. Clayton and Mr. Pearce.

The Committee of the House on foreign relations had reported in favour of making the chargeship to Rome a full mission, or rather an ambassadorship,—the term employed in the Constitution. Should the House and Senate agree to this, the mission or ambassadorship would be offered to Chief Justice Taney, provided he would accept it; and rumour said Mr. Buchanan would be offered the vacant seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. Should Chief Justice Taney refuse the mission to Rome, then it would be offered to Mr. Ingersoll. The bill to raise the chargeship to Rome to a full mission, would also raise those of Turin and Naples to the same grade; but raising the salary from 4500 dollars to 9000 dols., instead of 6000 dols., as was proposed by some of the members of the Committee, the bill, it was thought, might meet with some opposition in the House. It was also proposed to raise the post of Minister resident in Turkey and China to that of Minister Plenipotentiary, and so reduce that of Austria, which has dwindled down into a chargeship.

Preparations were making in New York for getting up a great mass meeting in favour of the nomination of General Taylor as a candidate for the next presidency. The meeting would take place on the 22nd of February

MEXICO

There are no later dates from the seat of war than those previously received—viz., Mexico, December 17, but fuller intelligence is given. It would seem that the Congress at Queretaro was virtually dissolved by the non-attendance of the members. The new Congress would assemble on the 1st January, and a correspondent of El Monitor says, that many of the new senators and deputies were already on the road to Queretaro. The commissioners from the Mexican Government had left for Guadalupe, after having had an interview with Mr. Trist. It was supposed they went to have a new conference with the Supreme Government on the subject of peace. Mr Trist, however, was acting, as it were, contrary to orders Having been recalled, he could not contract any valid terms of arrangement

SOUTH AMERICAN STATES

The River Plate.—We have advices from Monte Video, to the 29th of November, by the Thames steamer. Peace had been made to a request made by British merchants, and had granted 30 days' grace to vessels before closing the port of Buenos Ayres.

From Pernambuco, we learn that her Majesty's mail packet brig Pensaun, Lieutenant W Swainson, arrived there from Falmouth, on the 18th of December, and left on the 19th for Bahia. Several slave clipper schooners were at Pernambuco, waiting for cargoes. The arrivals from that quarter occurred during the stay of the John Ronnlly The slaves are worked like horses, both in the city and in the plantations.

SICILY.

Sicily had a constitution for many centuries, when, in 1812, it was modified, under the auspices of Lord Bentinck, and guaranteed by the English Government. In 1816, the Court of Naples, seeing Absolutism triumph in the greater part of Europe, endeavored to make the Sicilian Parliament to consent to abolish the Constitution, but the Parliament refused. Subsequently the Neapolitan Government imposed unjust taxes, in the hope of making the Constitution unpopular; and it was by that means only that, after putting down the liberty of the press. It abolished the distinctive flag of Sicily, and caused the Judges of the Criminal Court to prosecute with relentless severity all who defended the Sicilian constitution. By a decree of August 16, 1816, taxes were ordered to be levied without the interference of the Parliament In December of the same year appeared the famous decree by which Ferdinand established a new organization of his whole kingdom, thereby putting an end to the Sicilian Constitution, which he had sworn to maintain At the same time he published another decree, declaring that the amount of the taxes would be fixed every year by the King, but not exceed 1,847,326 ounces without the sanction of a Parliament. Nevertheless, this impost was subsequently increased twofold, and yet no Parliament was convoked. A promise had been given that a decree that public functions in Sicily should only be occupied by Sicilians; but this promise was sadalously violated. And not only was the liberty of the press abolished, but foreign newspapers, even of absolutist principles, were not allowed to enter the Island.

The Centenaire Erection at Rome.—The Correspondent, at Rome, of a morning paper, writing later from "the Eternal City," says:—"We are moving onward in the path of reform and progress, however with a dignified, slow, but steady pace. To proceed with deliberate and solemn step is the characteristic of Roman Statesmanship, and such has ever been the march of her leading minds in the important matter of ameliorations ever contemplated. It is not with us as it was once that our town is called the Eternal City No one is in a hurry here, and we take no account of time. The very genius of the place is a spirit of enduring permanence, and we have the difficulty of removing old abuses and reconciling the inveterate habit to salutary change. As an instance of how much the good Terminus rules in Rome, and how little liable an established thing is to alteration, I can mention that one of the apothecary shops, and the baker's shop, has even the identical marble counter and the scales are to be seen in full operation this week, just in the same state as they were when, over 300 years ago, Raphael's Fornarina was employed behind the counter, and a succession of bakers and baker maidens has never ceased to officiate therein. The almost invisible inscription over the plinth of the door was carved by Raphael's own hand, "HANC AEDEM FECIT QUAE VOLUIT." The family of Prince Massimo (our famous postmaster) have lived on the same spot where the Palazzo Massimo stands, in the Via de Massimi, for the last 900 years! When I was a student at the University here, a century ago (I am ashamed to own as much), I used to frequent, with the other collegians, a large establishment for dining in Via Condotti. There were ten waiters attending the various rooms 30 years ago, and, looking into the concern on the other day I recognised eight of the ten still extabt! The two others waited there no longer, because—they were dead."

Barbarous Execution in Spain.—Letters from Lerida of the 28th ult. speak of a shocking circumstance that occurred on the occasion of the execution of two robbers. Vicente Porta, a native of Alcarras, and Thomas Balagué, of Menaseges, had been tried by the Military Commission of that place, as authors of an atrocious crime. They were accused of having stolen a watch and eight dollars from the parish priest of Mux, in this province, and were condemned to suffer capital punishment. The execution took place about two o'clock. The condemned received the last sacrament, and it having appeared to Mayer, who commanded the shooting party, that Thomas Balagué was still breathing, he ordered two discharges to finish him. His orders were complied with, and more than the usual number of balls put into the body of the unfortunate men, which were soon after removed for burial in the cemetery, about half an-hour's distance from this town. Vincente Porta was buried, and Balagué was about to be interred in the same grave, when one of the spectators brought the latter a smothered groan proceed from the coffin. The cover was removed; the unhappy man was still living, and his movements showed the agony he was suffering from his many wounds. Information of the occurrence was immediately given to the superior military authority. The news spread about, and the people crowded to the spot where the unfortunate man was, in the hope of saving him. Herrika to the Commandant-General, arrived at the moment he was informed of the fact, sent orders to the town major, together with two soldiers, to put the unhappy man to death. Change, however, prevented the second shooting (which was to take place in the cemetery, in time to prevent the catastrophe. He enclosed the space where the unhappy man had been shot, and, de aced, in the most decided manner, that he would not consent to have him butchered The conflict between the military authority and the civil was great, but at length humanity prevailed. More than three hours the wounded man remained in his coffin, and nothing was done to stop the blood, which flowed abundantly from his wounds. During this time he gave repeated signs, not only of life, as he breathed heavily, but also of consciousness. At half-past five o'clock orders were given to allow him removed to the military hospital. But they came too late—he was a corpse!

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE COURT OF ROME.—The new Bishop of Manchester took his seat.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE laid on the table a Bill to enable her Majesty to establish diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome.

The Noble Marquis moved the first reading of the Bill, and gave notice that he would propose its second reading on Friday next. Lord STANLEY would not object to the first reading of the Bill, but he thought the noble Marquis might with propriety pursue with respect to it; but, as it would cause great excitement throughout the country, and as it was intended most unexpectedly, he urged upon the noble Marquis to postpone the second reading to a more distant day.

The Duke of RICHMOND also advised that a bill of such immense importance should not be pressed forward without giving time for due consideration to the people of England and Scotland had not the least idea that such a Bill was in contemplation, and it should have been announced in the Queen's Speech at the opening of Parliament. The Earl of EGLINTON said it would be impossible for the people of Scotland to read more than the notice given by the noble Marquis before Friday next; he, therefore, also requested the postponement of the second reading. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE expressed himself willing to accede to the request made, but did not fix any day for the second reading. The bill was read a first time

THE WEST INDIES

Lord STANLEY presented the petition from Trelawney, in Jamaica, of which he had given notice, and likewise several other petitions from sugar and coffee planters; and the noble Lord took the opportunity of entering fully into the question of our late colonial commercial policy, as bearing on this subject. He gave a full description of the crippled condition of the sugar planters, in consequence of the Negro Emancipation Act, and showed that, notwithstanding their hampered state, they had made no objection to the admission of East India and Mauritius sugar to equal competition, subject to the pledged faith of Parliament to protect them from competition with slave-grown produce. In 1846, however, the great free-trade experience was given to the colonists; for then, not only was slave-labour produce introduced, but the discriminating duty of 10s., which the members of the present Government declared in 1840 to be absolutely necessary for the support of the colonists, was abandoned. In fact, this act of 1846 was a bounty and bonus to slavery. We were wasting our energies and destroying our seamen on the enfeebling coast of Africa, in a ridiculous attempt to put a stop to the Slave-trade; while, on the contrary, we were paying a bounty to slavery in Brazil and Cuba. Under the encouragement held out to the East Indies and the Mauritius, the progress of sugar cultivation there had been most remarkable, and the quantity of our cotton home-manufactured goods taken in return by those colonies had increased in an extraordinary manner. But this exaction, on the part of the East Indian and Mauritian planters and merchants, to answer to the call of Parliament, had, since the passing of the Act of 1846, led to ruinous losses and to the almost universal bankruptcy of those parties; and, while the price of our colonial produce had fallen to the extent that caused the ruin of our merchants and planters, the price of sugars in Brazil and Cuba had risen to an extent that could not fail to enrich the owners of slave labour. Thus our colonial interests had been all but destroyed, while the exports of our cotton manufactures to our colonies had been reduced to an immense amount by this Act of 1846. Having discussed the several prayers set forth in the petitions, the noble Lord denounced as vacillating and uncertain the views entertained by the Government on the subject of our commercial colonial policy, the last evidences being the changed intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the use of molasses in distilleries, and the equalised duties on rum and British spirits. Even from the close of 1847 to the beginning of 1848, no reliance could be placed in the determination of the Government. As to the proposed remedial measures, it was his (Lord Stanley's) firm opinion that, do what they might, and apply what palliatives they might, it would be impossible for our colonial planters to compete, on equal terms, with the owners of slave labour. The result of all the folly and all the crime which Parliament had been guilty of would be, not to check slavery, not even to secure the miserable boon of cheap sugar, but to effect the ruin of our once prized and prosperous colonies

The Duke of GRAY admitted that the accounts which had been given of the distress existing in the West Indies were in the main correct, but he could not admit that it had in any measure been occasioned by the administration of the Government. The depreciation in value of every description of property had affected the West India interest in common with every other branch of trade, but there were other causes in operation of an unfavourable character peculiar to the colonies. The real cause of the existing distress might be traced to the defective character of our legislation in 1838. The first step in the great and holy purposed of the abolition of slavery, was the true and original cause of the whole distress. This was no new opinion of his. In 1833, when the measure was brought forward, he said it would work precisely as it had worked, only that the difficulties which had occurred were not so insuperable as he had expected they would have been. The great fault of the Act of Emancipation was, that instead of making any provision for meeting the difficulties which were expected to arise, it only adjourned the period by continuing a modified kind of slavery—the apprenticeship. No adequate remedy had been brought to bear upon the mind of the Negro, when that by which he had hitherto worked was withdrawn, and by deferring the time for meeting the difficulties which were certain to arise, they had increased the magnitude of the evil. Emancipated Negro in refusing to work in the same degree as formerly might easily have been foreseen. He was now able to earn in less than one day in each week more than he before earned in the whole week's labour. Why, then, was he to work more than an hour a day? Unless, therefore, some measures were adopted to raise the value of land, and render it incumbent on the Negro to work for his maintenance, in order to produce the means of subsistence, the same want of labour, and all its attendant difficulties, must continue. He differed from those who thought that everything which was bad for the planter was good for the Negro; both their interests, rightly understood, were identical. His Lordship then referred to the injurious effects produced by the plan of apprenticeship that had been adopted, and, as regarded the planters, contended that one of the principal causes of their difficulties was the reliance upon that system of protection which they erroneously considered so important for their welfare. He showed the fallacy of such dependence, and proved that it was at once the cause of their unwillingness to work, and of the planter's embarrassments. And he asked whether it was to be tolerated that the people of this country should be taxed to the extent of three millions sterling per annum, in order to keep up wages in Demerara, when such a point that a labourer could earn 2s. 1d. by five hours labour, instead of eight, and the planter add his profits in the same proportion? He showed that a return to protective duties was not possible; the colonists themselves were aware of this, and asked for other remedies. The Government, however, were desirous of affording all the assistance in their power to relieving the existing distress. They intended to encourage the emigration of Negroes to the Colonies, but not by any plan which would renew the horrors of the slave-trade. The Government also intended assisting the planters with a loan, and by such an alteration of the Navigation Laws as would, he felt confident, be essentially beneficial. Another measure of relief would be the admission of sugar and molasses into distilleries but, in consequence of difficulties which had been referred to the Excise authorities, no steps had yet been finally arranged for admitting the same article into breweries. As regarded the duty on rum, the Government desired to place the West Indian and the English distiller upon the same footing; but it was a question of calculation, and would be submitted to Parliament for its decision. His Lordship then entered at some length on an examination of the alleged fact that free labour could not compete with slave labour; and showed, by a reference to America and other countries, that free labour was always in reality the cheapest: and concluded by urging on the planter the necessity for the utmost energy in the exercise of his business, in order to derive those advantages from it which it was capable of affording.

The Bishop of OXFORD next addressed the House, and dwelt at considerable length on the horrors of suffering from the present system existing in Cuba and Brazil, and warned their lordships not to pursue any course that could make this country participate in the guilt of that system

The petition was then laid on the table, and, after Lord ASHBURTON had briefly addressed the House on the necessity of giving the planters some immediate assistance, and had presented petitions to that effect, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Sir G. GREY stated, in reply to a question from Mr. SCULLY, that Government would not propose either the resumption of the public work system, or of the system of feeding the people, for Ireland. He announced the fact that the collection of the poor rates in Ireland was becoming both larger and more easy.

JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL

Petitions were presented against the Jewish Disabilities Bill, and several in its favour. One of these latter was presented by Lord PALMERSTON from the Senate of the University of Cambridge, which was challenged by Mr GOULBURN, who, amidst much laughter, insisted that he had been entrusted with a petition from the same body of a directly contrary nature

Lord JOHN RUSSELL moved the second reading of the Jewish Disabilities Bill

Mr. ALDERMAN STAFFORD moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six month

Lord BRANDREY seconded the motion.

Mr. ROEBUCK maintained that the time we admitted Jews to reside in this country, we were bound in justice to place them on an equality with ourselves in every way. He denied that Christianity was part of the law of the land.

Mr. B. COCHRANE opposed the bill

Mr. M. MILNES supported the bill. He thought that, if man considered themselves oppressed, their oppression was a reality, for they were the sole judges of their feelings. He regretted that the Government had not taken advantage of the present opportunity to introduce a larger measure, and to abolish all tests.

Lord MAHON, believing that if the barrier were broken down, there would be no stop to the influx of infidels and pagans into Parliament, was prepared to give his vote against the second reading of the bill

Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH insisted that either the bill should be passed, or a bill should be introduced to make void the election of any gentleman of the Jewish persuasion, for it would be impossible to leave matters as at present. To reject the bill would, in his opinion, be imbecile bigotry and intolerance in its dotage

Mr. WALPOLE spoke against the bill.

Mr. SHELL, in support of the measure, observed that they had already made Jews the depositary of power. A Jew could now be High Sheriff, could empanel the jury by whom the first Christian commoner in the country might be tried Having gone so far with the Jews, why should they not now take one step further, and displace from the statute book the last remnant of intolerance? The Jew, who might be called upon to perform all the duties of a citizen, was fully entitled to all the privileges of one. The Jew did not derive any immunity from his religion, the religion of the Jew, therefore, should not subject him to any disqualification. It had been urged, that private penalty and privation there existed a difference. But all penalty resolved itself into privation. Every member of Parliament was a great deterrent, a detriment which resolved itself into a privation. Where was the origin of this "detrimental?" What had the Church to [illegible] Jews? She might have feared six millions of Catholics, she might have dreaded a million Methodists she might well, too, fear (pointing to Mr. Fox Maude) a million of Mormonites, as she might open and dedicate enemies without, and "spurious popery" and mutiny within; but what had she to apprehend from the patient and unprosclyting Jew? When Mr. O'Connell demanded the emancipation of the Catholics, he had six millions of people at his back; but the Jew approached Parliament, demanding to be emancipated, with nothing but reason and justice to prefer in his behalf. In such an Assembly, representing as it did the high intelligence as well as the high-mindedness of England, reason and justice were sure to triumph, and truth ultimately to prevail. Many affected alarm less the Christianity of the nation should be sapped by this measure to its foundations. But the Christianity of the two islands was as stable as the islands themselves. So long as the Constitution lasted, until Parliament itself should have passed away, the House of Commons would remain the mighty barrier, unbroken and unbroken, in which the religious feeling of the country would be faithfully reflected. This was the great guarantee for the security of religion. Such guarantee was not to be found in severe tests, at which honest men would pause, but which the Sardonic sceptic disdained and submitted to. He was done with the wanting of the inefficiency of their tests, it was supplied by the [illegible] of the infidel Bolingbroke, who climbed to the pinnacle of power by means of the House of Commons, which was now called upon to shut its doors against the Jews, against the man who believed in the perpetual existence of our nobler part, in the mercy of God, and in the practices of humanity who fulfilled the ten great injunctions in which all morality was comprised, and who professed the creed on which Christianity itself was founded. There was no authority in the Scriptures for this imposition of temporal penalties for the propagation of Heaven's truth. Not only was persecution not consonant to the spirit of Christianity, but it was a practice repudiated in establishing it. Christianity was established not by, but in spite of, persecution; and was now to be said that Christianity was to be maintained by a principle the very reverse of that on which it was established? For centuries the history of the Jews was one of persecution and blood. Catholics and Protestants had practised the same. Every formation did nothing for them. As a Catholic, he was proud of the exploitory steps which had recently been taken in their behalf by Catholic countries—steps which he hoped would be fully imitated here. London had, in his opinion, made a noble manifesto ion of its will. Were they prepared to throw the Jews back upon London, that London might throw the Jew back again upon them? Such conduct would not only be inconsistent with the leading principles of their faith, but it would go far to prevent the accomplishment of their own object—the conversion of the Jews. Their policy was to identify the Jew, in all civil respects, with the Englishman, and to lead him to believe that he had a common country with those in the midst of whom he lived. The Jew was now manacled but by few fetters, but still sufficiently numerous and strong to bind him fast to his faith sufficiently onerous to make it apostacy to depart from that faith. Let them unfetter the Jew, and when he ceased to be persecuted for his religion, his heart would be more open to conviction than it could be expected to be so long as he laboured under existing disabilities.

Mr. NEWDEGATE then spoke in opposition to the bill, and asserted that money, had been plentifully distributed throughout the metropolis, for the purpose of getting up petitions in favour of the bill, the scale of prices being 1s. 6d. for the first hundred signatures, 3s. for the next, and 5s. for every hundred that followed

The debate was adjourned, on the motion of Mr. C. PEARSON.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY

CONVEYANCE OF MAILS.—Lord COLCHESTER moved for returns of the contracts made by Government for the conveyance of mails by steam vessels, of the tonnage, &c., of such vessels, and their crews, and for the number, rank, and of being effectively used as ships of war. The Earl of AUCKLAND made no objection to the returns required.—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH thought that these vessels would be found very inefficient for war purposes, because, from the sense of these contracts was far too much. The Governments of England and India paid half a million more than for these steam vessels than was received for the letters conveyed by them.—The Earl of ADDESLEY as it was admitted that the returns could be converted into an effective naval armament at a very short notice.—The returns were ordered

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE COURT OF ROME.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE gave notice that he would, on Thursday next, move the second reading of the bill for establishing diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome

The Earl of EGLINTON gave notice that he would then move that the bill be read a clause to prevent any ecclesiastic from being employed in these diplomatic negotiations.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE said he would not ask their Lordships to consent to the bill if he was not able to satisfy them that no injury to the Established Church would be caused by it.—The Bishop of EXETER expressed his satisfaction that Lord Lansdowne had so far committed himself as even Lord EGLINTON had done, but he rejoiced that he had received from the Lord President the declaration he had just made

To a question put by the Earl of ELLENBOROUGH, Earl GREY stated that he would have no objection to give a return of the number of arms given up in Ireland under the late Act. Adjourned to Thursday

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY

Sir R. INGLIS presented the petition of which he had given notice, from the Dean and Chapter of Windsor, complaining of the nuisance of the barracks, if they would, in the neighbourhood of the British Constitution, and the liberties of the English people.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that he would make the general financial statement of the year on Friday next.

In reply to a question from Colonel LINDSAY, Mr. F. MAULE said that, though the Government could not at once do away with cruelty in harnessing, they would, as the present leases expire, prohibit spirituous liquors to be sold in barracks.

To a question from Mr. S. O'BRIEN, Sir W. SOMERVILLE replied that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Registration Bill for Ireland.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. HUME complained of the incompleteness of the return made of the actual and probable expenses of the new Houses of Parliament, and asked Sir R. Inglis when he intended to move for the Committee of Inquiry. Mr. B. OSBORNE asked the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests if he would guarantee that the estimated expense of £1,400,000 would not be exceeded? Lord MORPETH also inquired that day was the anniversary of the fire, and he could only say that he hoped the architect would be able to bear it out. Mr. B. OSBORNE gave notice that on the first order of the day he would call attention to the subject.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. C ANSTEY being about to rise to bring forward his "monster motion," on our Foreign Policy, from 1793 to the present time, Mr. HUME made an appeal to the hon. member to postpone his motion, and give precedence to the adjourned debate on the Jewish Disabilities Bill. Mr. Anstey declined acceding to any such arrangement, as he was desirous of bringing forward his various articles, each of which would require a night's discussion.—Mr. A. STAFFORD also appealed to the hon. member.—Mr. ANSTEY refused to give way.—Lord J. RUSSELL remarked that as the hon. member persisted he should understand well that he persisted against the wish of the House.—Mr. ANSTEY then proceeded with his motion for the production of the several documents, forty in number, which have been enumerated on the notice paper since the commencement of the session. The object of his motion was, he said, not merely to ask for papers, but to establish a charge affecting the character of the Foreign Minister. He would not extend his remarks over forty articles, as stated by Mr. Hume, but would confine them to two great points, viz., the danger of aggression abroad and of treason at home. The hon. member was proceeding with his speech when the House was counted out, at a quarter past seven

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. C ANSTEY being about to rise to bring forward his "monster motion," on our Foreign Policy, from 1793 to the present time, Mr. HUME made an appeal to the hon. member to postpone his motion, and give precedence to the adjourned debate on the Jewish Disabilities Bill. Mr. Anstey declined acceding to any such arrangement, as he was desirous of bringing forward his various articles, each of which would require a night's discussion.—Mr. A. ### NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT BILL

Mr. LABOUCHERE moved the Committee on this bill.

Lord LINCOLN appealed to the President of the Board of Trade whether it would be right to proceed with a bill so important as the suspension of the Constitution of New Zealand in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury from the House, and in the absence of the Under Secretary of the Colonies from Parliament

Mr. LABOUCHERE said that, as the principle of the bill was admitted on the second reading, the Committee was the proper stage to consider the details.

Mr. GLADSTONE thought the simplest, wisest, and most practical course for the Government to pursue relative to New Zealand, would be to declare that the time had not yet arrived for establishing the new Constitution, that Parliament was in error in sanctioning the old Constitution, and that they had it in contemplation to propose a new Constitution; but that they would wait for mature and experimental knowledge before they would attempt to settle its particular forms and enactments.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said the principle of the bill was to entrust to the Governor of New Zealand the discretion of extending to the colony free institutions, and a liberal constitution, either wholly or in part.

Sir EDWARD BUXTON trusted that, despite the influence of the New Zealand Company, the Government would [illegible] towards the New Zealanders upon [illegible] principles of justice.

Lord LINCOLN said that he wished to make a discussion on the principle of the bill, viz., that the constitution of New Zealand should be enunciated for 5 years; and he gave notice that, on the bringing up of the report, he would raise such discussion

After observations from Mr. F. SCOTT and Mr. ADDERLEY,

Mr. ANSTEY moved, as an amendment, that the House do not into Committee on the bill that day week

After the amendment having been found to second the amendment, the House went into Committee

On the first clause a discussion arose, which did not terminate before four o'clock, when the Chairman of the House, therefore no progress was made in the Committee

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY

HALIFAX AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.—Earl FITZWILLIAM presented a petition for the grant of a loan [illegible] day for the construction of a railway from Halifax to Quebec. It would be recollected that, at the time of the outbreak of the rebellion in Canada, there was great difficulty in transmitting arms and ordnance [illegible] into the interior of Canada; and had there been a railway from Halifax to Quebec, there would [illegible] transport of these stores.—After a few words from Lord ASHBURTON, Earl CAREW assured the Lordships that the importance of railways in the interior of Canada had not escaped the attention of the Government. They considered it of the greatest importance, and a line of communication between Halifax and Quebec. The engineering officers engaged in surveying the country had succeeded in finding a practicable route, but, until their report was in the possession of the Government, he could not form any opinion as to the propriety of assisting any particular company. At the present moment there were more pressing demands upon every one of the colonies on the Government for assistance in the construction of great public works, but the circumstances of the country did not permit of large advances being made for this purpose

POOR-LAW (IRELAND).—On the motion of Earl FITZWILLIAM, after a short conversation, a correspondence between the Commissioners of which the Boards of Guardians have been dissolved, stating the population, the extent of acres, and rateable value of each union, was ordered

THE PAPAL INTERCOURSE WITH ROME.—In reply to Lord Stanley, the Marquis of LANSDOWNE stated his intention, if the bill on this subject were read a second time on Thursday next, as he expected it would, to move the Committee on the following evening.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

COUNTY COURTS.—Dr. BOWRING inquired whether it was the intention of the Government to bring in a bill to amend the County Courts Act. The Act, particularly with respect to the expense to which suitors were put, was [illegible] total failure. His constituents loudly complained of its injustice.—Sir G. GREY replied that it was unnecessary to bring in any bill on the subject, as by the present Act the Secretary to the Treasury was empowered to [illegible] gentleman had been for some time engaged in obtaining information [illegible] various Courts, and when he had collected sufficient information, the Government would determine what alterations should be made. The inquiry was in an advanced state, and no time would be lost in informing the House of the nature of any improvements which the Government might deem necessary

THE WINDOW DUTIES.—Lord DUNCAN gave notice that he would propose a total repeal of the duties on the 5th February

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES.—Mr. EWART said that he would on this day fortnight bring in a bill for granting the power of appeal in criminal cases.

DERBY HARBOUR.—The Hon. Member also stated that he would, unless the Government should themselves bring forward some measure on the subject, bring before the House his motion on the subject of a system of direct taxation

WASTE LANDS (IRELAND).—Mr. P. SCROPE gave notice that he would, upon this day, bring before the notice of the House the report of the Poor-Law Commissioners, respecting the propriety of [illegible] waste lands of Ireland for the purpose of giving employment to the able-bodied poor.

IMPRISONMENT.—Lord NUGENT moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the 2nd and 3rd Victoria as gave the power of applying the system of separate imprisonment to per ons before trial. The noble Lord entered at some length into the subject, but ultimately, after a few words from Sir G. GREY, the motion was withdrawn.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.—Lord MORPETH then moved for leave to bring in a bill on this subject. He described its provisions at some length; they are generally according to the recommendations of the sanitary report; but the Bill does not include the City of London, nor modify the Window Tax, nor prohibit burials in towns. The exercise powers of the act are entrusted to Central Boards. After some discussion leave was given to introduce the bill

MR. EWART moved for returns of papers connected with our trade with China this caused a discussion on the Tea Duties, in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer took part, and to which he gave a pledge on the present duties. After some other unimportant business, the House adjourned

Mr. Doane died on the 8th instant, after a long illness.

THE REV. DR GODDARD

THE Rev. Charles Goddard, D.D., was for many years reputed a divine of great learning and research; he possessed an original and highly cultivated mind, and evinced much knowledge of general, classical, and theological literature. In his early years, Dr. Goddard had held diplomatic and consular appointments at various European Courts; he subsequently took holy orders, and became successively a Prebendary and Archdeacon of Lincoln; the latter dignity he held thirty years. He was distinguished for several able charges which he delivered, and which were printed, on matters relative to ecclesiastical law, a subject on which his knowledge was unrivalled. On being made Sub-Dean of Lincoln, he resigned his former appointments; the Sub-Deanery he held till his death, together with the Rectory of Bstock, in Leicestershire, and one of the Crown Chaplaincies. Besides his charges, he was the author of numerous single sermons and tracts, and a publication, revised by himself, which he delivered some years since on the nomination of Lord Grenville, to whom he was domestic chaplain. ### BUILDING SOCIETIES.

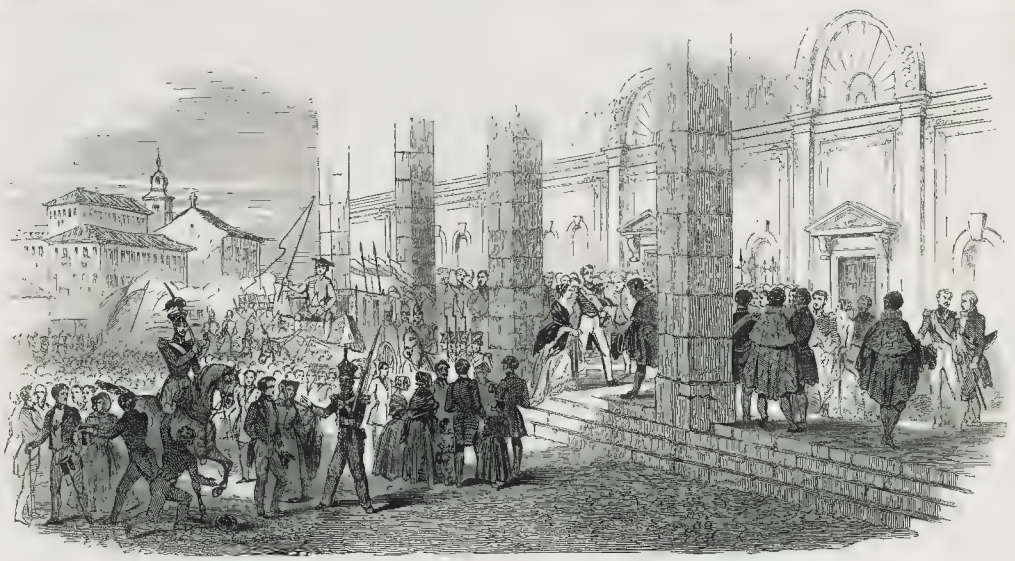
BUILDING SOCIETIES.—The increase of Building Societies is working most beneficial results for the working classes. People of limited incomes are enabled through their agency to appropriate periodically a portion of their [illegible] to the purchase of houses; so that, by borrowing money from these societies, a man becomes the proprietor of a house for little more than [illegible] annually pays for its rent. But their is a defect in the system. If the borrower fall, either by death or otherwise, to keep up his monthly payments, the house is seized and resold to recover the remainder of the debt. To remedy this the principle of assurance has come to the aid of the people. As in the ordinary system of assurance was no exception, Mr. Scratchley, Actuary to the Western Life Assurance Society, 3, Parliament-street, London, has adopted tables for a Guaranteed Annuity Policy, by which, in consideration of a small payment annually, for seven, ten, or twelve years, that Society undertakes to secure a borrower or his family from liability of any kind in case of his premature death. All the advantages of Building Societies are thus preserved against risk of loss—the plan cannot be too widely made known



OPENING OF THE PORTUGUESE CORTES.—ARRIVAL OF THE QUEEN.

DESTRUCTION OF CHAGRES BY FIRE.

In the Jamaica Times, we find the melancholy tidings, received by the Avon, from the Spanish Main, of the almost total destruction of the town of Chagres by fire, on the night of the 8th of December. Among the buildings of note thus consumed, was the so-called Custom-house, which, at the time, most unfortunately contained an entire cargo of merchandise of great value, just landed from the schooner Dessengano.

"It has been remarked," says the Jamaica Times, "and certainly with great justice, that the Government of New Grenada should have had a suitable fireproof edifice as a depôt, similar to that which has been constructed by the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company, with the sole view of encouraging the transit of property by way of the Isthmus. Yet this 'Custom House' was nothing more than a wooden hovel with a thatched roof, wherein was deposited the valuable property which the Directors of the Customs received from the different merchants at the moment of their arrival in port. Had the property in question, it is added, been destroyed by an earthquake, no one could be considered responsible, because, as the edifice did not contain a single stone, the property in this case might be preserved from such danger; but, having had the means of providing against the imminent disaster which occurred in what was actually called a depôt, the Government is unquestionably culpable for not having evaded it. It is reported, that the interested proprietors who have suffered in this event are preparing to present their claims before the Granadian Government; and it is to be hoped that it will recognise the justice of the case, and order payment without delay. The origin of the fire is supposed to have been intentional, with a view to robbery; and a black man has been apprehended on suspicion of being the guilty person."

The town is a small seaport named after the river Chagres, which traverses in a longitudinal valley a considerable portion of the Isthmus of Panama, and at the above town enters the Caribbean Sea. The whole course of the river hardly exceeds 80 or 90 miles: it has acquired considerable importance by having become the means of facilitating the commercial intercourse between Europe and the countries of South America on the Pacific Ocean.

The road between the town of Puerto Bello and Panama is a series of steep ascents and descents, and quite impracticable during the rainy season. This circumstance, added to the extremely unhealthy climate of Puerto Bello, has been the cause of the entire abandonment of this road, and in its place a line of communication has been opened between Panama and Chagres. The port is a little Sandy Bay, with a ledge of rocks across its entrance, which has not more than fifteen feet water in its deepest places, and in many parts rises to the surface. The place is protected by a lofty fort, as shown in our Illustration, from a recent sketch; in the Bay, too, are seen some of the canoes of the natives, and one of the river barges, such as are used for the conveyance of goods from Cruces to the port.

THE OPENING OF THE PORTUGUESE CORTES.

The Cortes of Portugal, summoned to meet on Sunday the 2nd of January, was opened, as our readers are aware, by the Queen of Portugal in person.

This solemn event following so immediately upon the close of a cruel civil war, and which, but for English aid, might have terminated in the loss of her Majesty's crown and in the recall of a proscribed Prince, became an occurrence of surpassing interest to the worthy lieges of Lisbon; while a doubt, too, of its taking place at all lingered in the public mind up to the very hour of the ceremony; this impression gaining strength from the known fact of the British Minister, Sir George H. Seymour, having, even on the vesper of the day named, formally presented a protest against the act, upon the grounds of the Convention of Gramido not having been complied with. Another cause of excitement, and even apprehension, existed in the rumour that the citizens would attempt to master the palace, attack the Cortes, and overpower the garrison. Troops, however, had been for some days pouring into Lisbon from all quarters. The Camarilla governing the palace adhered to their determination, and the Cortes was opened, although not even one third of the Deputies returned had reached Lisbon; and while the presence of an overwhelming force of soldiery guaranteed public tranquillity, yet the Government had spared neither exertion nor expense to render the procession and ceremony both gorgeous and attractive.

At an early hour on the morning of the day, the streets through which the Royal cortège would pass, and every avenue in the vicinity of the Palace and of the Hall of the Cortes became densely crowded; and as the hour approached for her Majesty's leaving the Palace, it was calculated that, exclusive of the garrison, there were not less than forty thousand people present.

The preliminary ceremony took place at ten o'clock A.M., when a solemn mass was performed in the Metropolitan Cathedral, at which the Peers of Parliament, and such of the newly elected Deputies who had arrived in the capital, together with the High Officers of State, attended. On the conclusion of this solemnity, the Peers and Deputies adjourned to the Hall of the Cortes, to await her Majesty, and proceeded to form around the dais or platform upon which the Throne was placed—the Peers on the right of the Throne, the Deputies to the left; while, upon a seat less elevated, a seat was placed for and occupied by the President of the Chamber of Peers. A Deputation was then selected consisting of twelve members of either Chamber—the one from the Peers being headed by Costa Cabral in person, while the members of the Lower House assigned the same post of honor to the Minister's Brother, José Bernardo da Silva Cabral. The Deputation left the Hall, proceeding to the Vestibule, to receive her Majesty on arrival. From the Vestibule to the Chamber the Arches Guard lined the way, while in the Entrance Hall there were stationed (besides gallant company), the Kings-at-Arms, Pursuivants, and Heralds; the Yeomen of the Guard and the Bands of the Household Troops; the entire of the building being circled by picked detachments from the various Military Corps, in their full and varied costumes, and the brilliant Staffs of the Generals careering to and fro, presented a really animating scene.

Shortly after twelve o'clock, her Majesty descended the grand staircase of the Palace of Necessidades and entered the Royal carriage, accompanied by her husband, the Prince Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg, followed in a second State coach by two of the Infant Princes, her children, and escorted by a formidable body of cavalry, including two regiments of Lancers, led by their English commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Griffith; and so imposing appeared the military force by which the entire route was guarded, some six or seven thousand men to less than six or seven streets, that not a murmur of dissatisfaction was uttered, nor the slightest insult ventured; but just as the procession neared the Cortes, some incorrigible and daring malignant, shouted from amongst the crowd, and with stentorian voice, viva Dom Miguel Primeiro, e morrão os Ladrões. Her Majesty was evidently startled, and could the offender have been reached by the soldiery, little doubt is there but that his life would have been the sacrifice of his temerity; but, screened from observation and protected by the people, the man managed to escape. With this solitary exception, the most profound silence reigned; a whisper might have been heard in that crowd; it was as if the survivors of a nation were assisting at its interment, while the entire absence of welcome, the dark and furtive looks of the people, made evident impression upon the Queen. She appeared visibly affected, and from the commencement to the close of the ceremony seemed to struggle with emotion, and to feel keenly the slight so publicly inflicted upon her

Her Majesty reached the Cortes by a few minutes after one o'clock; signal rockets were sent up; when salvos of artillery from the Castle of St. George, from the Portuguese Squadron, and from the French frigate at anchor in the Tagus, announced the Royal arrival. The English fleet did not salute, but preserved an ominous silence; neither were the English vessels dressed out in their streaming flags, as was the case with the ships of other nations stationed in the river; and while the rest of the Diplomatic body graced the ceremony with their presence, the absence of Sir George Seymour, and of the British Admiral, was painfully remarked.

Her Majesty, slighting, was received by the Parliamentary Deputation, and, taking the arm of her husband, and accompanied by her children, proceeded in state to open the Chambers, the Yeomen of the Guard, bearing massive silver maces, ushering the procession. In the rigid etiquette of Portuguese ceremonial assigning to each member of the cortège his or her allotted place.

Her Majesty and Consort, and the Royal suite, then followed, the Queen's train being borne by the Duchess of Terceira, accompanied and assisted by the Ladies in Waiting and the Maids of Honour—by no means the least attractive portion of the procession. On the Royal cortège entering the door of the Chamber, the High Constable and the Standard Bearer of the Empire received each the insignia of their respective office from the hands of attendant pages. The doors thrown open, her Majesty was received by the officers of the Chamber, and escorted to the Throne, the Peers and Deputies having risen. Her Majesty having gracefully returned the greeting of the Senators, proceeded to occupy the Throne, a chair being placed for the Prince Consort on her Majesty's left, and the members of the Chambers resuming their seats. The Court then ranged around the Throne, the High Constable and the Standard Bearer on either side, the one bearing the Sword of State aloft, and the other supporting the Royal Standard displayed. Her Majesty receiving the Speech from a Minister, proceeded to read it in a firm voice, and, at its conclusion, pronounced the words

"Esta aberta a Sessão le 1848."
"The Session of 1848 is now opened."

Her Majesty's personal suite was sufficiently gay; of coronets, plumed caps, and stars, there was display enough; but the majority of the Corte lacked that grand prestige in the eyes of the people; there were no historic associations attached to the names, nor titles of the nobles present—nearly all of them being of her Majesty's own creation, and appeared to wear their honours but awkwardly; beauty was there, but even amongst the bevy of fair dames and of dark-eyed donnas, there wanted that certain air that proclaims the "lady of high degree." In fact, the Queen, controlled by the necessities of position, has been profuse, not circumspect, in the showering of honours. The magic wand of the good fairy, it is true, transformed the sooty garb of Cinderella into Royal robes, but it was nature who fitted the tiny foot to the glass slipper.

The Grandees and long-descended Fidalgos live in hostile seclusion from the Court—have never recognised the new dynasty—have "preserved the bird in their bosom," and their faith for the banished Prince; and thus, Majesty loses something of its splendour, and the Court of the Queen of Portugal almost its character of regality.

Similar ceremonial accompanied the withdrawal of the Queen from the Cortes as marked her entry; amongst the spectators the same sad and sullen silence was observed; and not once did there arise from amidst that dense crowd a single "God save ye," nor was one solitary viva shouted for

DONNA MARIA SEGUNDA.

RETURNS OF MORTALITY.

The return of the mortality in 117 districts in England, for the quarter ending December, 1847, has just been issued, by authority of the Registrar-General, and presents many curious illustrations of the epidemic which has proved so fatal to the young, the old, and those afflicted with chronic disease. The districts from which the returns have been obtained, contained, in 1841, a population of 6,612,800, and this number must, of course, have increased since that year. The increase of mortality from the increase of population may be estimated at 1.75 annually. In the quarter ending December 31, 1847, the number of deaths was 57,923; in the corresponding quarter of 1841 the number was only 39,292. The latter year, however, was very healthy, the difference below the average, in the number of deaths being 2655. If the mortality had increased at the usual rate, the number of deaths in the same year 1841 would then have been 41,947. In 1845, the number was 39,291, being 2670 below the calculated number, and showing that this year was the most healthy for seven years previous. The deaths in 1845 exceeded the estimated number by 1345, and 1847 by 14,376. In this former year the number was 53,093, the number estimated 45,748; in the latter year the number was 57,925, the estimated number 46,549.

"The deaths in the year 1845 were 166,000; in 1847, 215,000. The excess in 1847 is 49,000, or not less than 35,000 over the corrected average of 1839-45.

"In London the deaths registered in the quarters ending December, 1845-6-7, were 11,836, 13,221, and 16,553 (thirteen weeks). The greatest number ever registered in any quarter of the nine previous years was 14,686 in the severe winter of 1845.

It is calculated that if the chance of a child in the country under 5 years of age will die in three months be represented by 1, the chance that a child in London will die in the same time is 2. Of course it follows that when any epidemic prevails the chance of escaping it is 2 to 1 in favour of the country. The following is descriptive of the rise of the influenza in the last year, and the probable causes of the diseases which prevailed:—

"The population was inadequately supplied with potatoes, and scurvy was prevalent in the beginning of the year. Meat and bread were dear, and want and rife; vagrants flocked in from the country, the poor Irish came to their kindred, the workhouses were crowded. In April and May typhus became epidemic; instead of the average 24, 80 died weekly. It steadily spread and increased, until it killed 111 victims in a single week. Diarrhœa, dysentery, and cholera, had been a little more fatal than usual throughout the year; 17, however, only died of these diseases in the first week of July; the mean temperature of the air was above 60 deg.; the number of deaths rose to 38, 47, 67, 125, 128, 188, by the middle of August, and then gradually subsided. Notwithstanding the continued prevalence of typhus and scarlatina, the deaths in the last week of October were only 945; 1 person died of influenza, 36 of bronchitis (inflammation of the air tubes), and 62 of pneumonia (inflammation of the substance of the lungs). In three weeks following, ending November 20, the total deaths were 1052, 1098, and 1086; of which 2, 4, and 4, were by influenza; 49, 58, and 61, by bronchitis; 68, 79, and 95, by pneumonia. The wind had generally been blowing S.S.W. and S.W. since the first week in October; the weather was unusually warm; a brilliant aurora was observed, and shook the magnets, on October 24; it appeared eight times during the quarter; on Tuesday, November 16th, there was a remarkable darkness; the wind changed to N.W., and amidst various changes still blew from the north over Greenwich at the rate of 160 and 260 miles a day. The mean temperature of the air suddenly fell from 14° above to 10° below the average: Monday it was 54°; Friday, 43°; Friday night, 27°. The earth was frozen. The wind was calm three days, and on Saturday evening, a dense fog lay over the Thames and London for the space of five hours. No electricity stirred in the air during the week. All was still as if nature held her breath at the sight of the destroyer, come forth to sacrifice her children. On Sunday the sky was overcast, the air damp, the wind changed in the night to S. by E., and passed for four days over Greenwich, at the rate of 200 and 300 miles daily; the temperature suddenly rose, and remained from 9° to 9° above the average through the week ending the 27th of November: when the deaths of 1077 persons, 519 males, and 558 females were registered; 771 persons under 15 years of age, 528 aged 15 60, and 388 of the age of 60 and upwards. Influenza was epidemic. On the first week of December, two thousand four hundred and fifty four persons died: 1141 were males, 1313 females; 1012 children, 712 persons in the prime of life, 730 of the age of 60 and upwards. On the week following, two thousand four hundred and sixteen persons died: 1175 males, 1241 females; 1016 under the age of 15; 698 at the age of 15—60; and 702 at the age of 60 and upwards. The deaths in the weeks ending Saturday, Dec. 18, Dec. 25, and Jan. 1, were 1946, 1947, and 1959 11,339 persons died in six weeks, and altogether the epidemic carried off more than 5000 souls over and above the mortality of the season. The epidemic attained the greatest intensity in the second week of its course; raged with nearly equal violence through the third week; declined in the fourth, and then partly subsided; but the temperature falling, the mortality remained high not only through December, but through the month of January.

"Adults and the aged seem to have suffered most from the epidemic; thus, the deaths in the three weeks ending November 13, of persons under 15 were 1503; in the three weeks ending December 18, they were 2846. In the same periods the deaths of persons between the ages of 15 and 60 were 966 and 1970; at the age above 60, 576 and 1959.

"The mortality in childhood was raised 83 per cent.; in manhood, 104 per cent.; in old age, 247 per cent. From the age of 4 to 25, however, the mortality was comparatively not very much increased; at the age of 10 to 15, the healthiest period of life, it was scarcely increased at all in girls."

In cases of old age, and where chronic diseases existed, the influenza was generally fatal.

"The poison, permeating the whole system, fastens chiefly on the mucous membrane lining the sinuses of the face and head, and the air tubes of the lungs. Hence it is fatal to the asthmatic; the deaths directly ascribed to asthma in October and November were 12 weekly; in the six weeks of the influenza epidemic, 77, 86, 78, 52, 14, 25, besides the numerous cases classed under influenza. 30 deaths were ascribed to bronchitis in the week ending October 30, and 49, 58, 61, 196, 343, 295, 234, 107, and 138, in the nine following weeks. 62 deaths were ascribed to pneumonia in the same week, and 68, 79, 96, 170, 306, 294, 185, 131, 148, in the nine weeks following."

The country districts do not appear to have been affected to any extent, a fact which shows how much the purity of the air has to do with epidemic diseases.

THE KAFFIR WAR.—The following is an estimate of the sum that will probably be required towards paying the expenses beyond the ordinary grants for the years 1846, 1847, 1848, for army and ordnance services occasioned by the Kaffir war:—For extra expenditure for pay, clothing, arms, and accoutrements of the burgher force, for provisions, transport and barrack expenditure of troops, for ordnance and special engineer expenses, and other charges incidental to the armament against the Kaffirs in the year ended on the 31st of March, 1847, £923,000; for similar expenditure in the year ending on the 31st of March, 1848, £388,000: total, £1,100,000.

MR. D. WADDINGTON, M.P.

MR. DAVID WADDINGTON is one of the many members returned to this Parliament by railway interest. He was, at a very early age, engaged in business in Manchester, but afterwards directed himself more exclusively to railway concerns. Some speeches he made at meetings of the Manchester and Birmingham line were marked by so much talent and knowledge of the subject, that he was placed on the Direction of that line, and afterwards became Deputy-Chairman. We believe it was at the instance of Mr. Hudson, by whom his abilities were soon appreciated, that he accepted the situation he now holds of Deputy-Chairman of the Eastern Counties. He has not yet made any display as a politician: it is probable he will confine himself to his "speciality." In opinion he is a Conservative and Protectionist. He sits for Maldon, for which he was returned at the last election.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF SUNDERLAND DOCKS.

YESTERDAY week was an auspicious day for the port of Sunderland, inasmuch as it was devoted to the ceremonious commencement of an undertaking which will, doubtless, prove an important event in the commercial history of the place. This was the Laying of the Foundation-Stone of the New Docks at Sunderland, which was performed on the 4th inst., by George Hudson, Esq., M.P., in the presence of a vast concourse of spectators.

The day was generally a holiday: the bells of the parish church—"the poor man's only music"—pealed forth during the morning; the vessels in the harbour were decorated with flags, and banners were displayed at all the principal works and public establishments in the town. The parties who were to take an active part in the ceremony, met in the Exchange Buildings, and walked thence in procession to the Docks; to view which, the streets, and the windows of the houses were crowded with spectators.

On arriving at the site of the stone, Mr. Murray, the Engineer of the Company, who is the projector of the undertaking, delivered to Mr. Hudson the tools to be employed by him on the occasion, and the articles to be placed in a cavity which had been prepared in the stone.

Mr. Hudson, on receiving the sealed bottle, placed it in the cavity of the stone, the remaining space of which was filled up with gutta percha, which was poured into it in a semi-fluid state. It was then covered with a zinc plate, which bore the following inscription:—

The foundation-stone of the Sunderland Dock was laid on Friday, the 4th of February, 1848, by the Directors; George Hudson, Esq., Chairman; Christopher Bramwell, Esq., Deputy-Chairman; the Lord Mayor of York, David Jonassohn, Esq., Thomas Brown, Esq., Richard Spoor, Esq., William Ord, Esq., Thos. Reed, Esq., R. Davies, Esq., Nicholas Wood, Esq., J. Clay, Esq.; Engineer, J. E. Murray, Esq.; Solicitors, J. J. Wright, Esq., and George Walton Wright, Esq.; Secretary, Mr. Coxon; Contractors, Messrs. J. Craven and Sons.

The cement was then spread over the surface, and Mr. Bramwell handed a silver trowel to Mr. Hudson, wherewith to adjust it.

The stone, which had been suspended by the usual means during these proceedings, was then lowered into its intended site; and Mr. Hudson, having applied the rule and square, and thereby ascertained that it was properly adjusted, struck it three blows with the mallet. Mr. Hudson then delivered the inaugural oration.

The Directors of the Company and a large party of individuals afterwards dined together in the Bridge Hotel; and the proceedings of the day were closed by a grand ball in the Athenæum, which was attended by upwards of a thousand of the élite of the community.

WAITING AT A STATION.—That same night Mr. Howard Price left Pottleton, and started for London by the first up-mail train that had gone from the village. He waited a long time at the station; and stations are not the liveliest places in the world to pass an hour or so in—most especially late at night. For that of Pottleton being removed from the haunts of life—as they generally are, on a bleak common, or down a steep cutting, or at the junction of a newly-made, quaggy, painful cross-road—no sound broke the stillness but the ticking of the clock, or the chirping of the clerk's tired pen, as he filled up unending papers, ruled like problems in a ciphering book. A tired policeman opened the door every now and then, and looked up and down the line, apparently from wanton curiosity and to let in the cold; for he knew it was not the time for anything to come. A rough frizzy man brought in some uncouth leathern bags, and plumped them down, as though they had been empty coal sacks, in a corner—and yet they contained the essence of the loves and hopes and hates of hundreds; and then branch coaches dragged over the new gravel with more sleepy people. At last a discordant bell sounded, and the train came up. Mr. Howard Price was rudely inserted into a carriage amidst five drowsy passengers, dimly seen in the glimmer of the light; the train went on again, and he was on his way to town—stopping once at a refreshment station where some pretty girls, wrapped up in shawls, and pale and shivering with keeping awake, poured out coffee with their eyes shut, and handed over quarters of pork-pie, which once partaken, kept the travellers in a lively state of combined watchfulness and indigestion all the rest of the journey.—"The Pottleton Legacy," by Albert Smith, in the London Telegraph.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT. The following is a copy of the Architect's Report of the present state of the works at the New Palace, at Westminster:—"The carcase works of the building, as far as the site is available or free from temporary buildings, are completed, with the following exceptions, viz.:—the upper portions of the Victoria Tower, the Clock Tower, and the Central Tower, which are upon an average one hundred feet above the ground; St. Stephen's Porch, above the level of seventy-five feet from the ground; the bays of the western portion of St Stephen's Hall, which are within eight feet of their intended height; and the central masses of the building abutting upon the Central Tower, and the towers of the river front, which, together with St. Stephen's Hall, are now being roofed in. The scaffolding, stages, and hoisting tackle for the three towers are nearly completed, and contracts have been made for proceeding with the upper portion of these towers. The stone groin over the Octagon Hall, under the Central Tower, is turned, the centring is struck, and the bosses are now being carved. The stone grouting to the corridors in communication with the Central Hall, and other grouting in various parts of the building, including those over the public staircase, are for the most part completed. The fittings and finishings of the Peers' and Commons' libraries, the Peers' refreshment rooms, and the offices attached thereto, and the offices for the Clerk of the Crown, are so far advanced as to allow of those portions of the building being occupied prior to the Easter recess. The fittings and finishings of the committee-rooms and corridors in the one-pair story of the river front are far advanced, and might have been completed by next Easter if the rooms had not been required for use at the commencement of the present session. The finishings of the Lord Great Chamberlain's apartments, her Majesty's robing-room, and the wood ceilings, wainscot framings, doors, &c., for numerous apartments, corridors, &c., in various portions of the building, are in hand, and in part fixed. There are at present 1,399 men engaged upon the works of the New Palace, at which number 776 are employed at the building; 120 at the quarries; 333 at the Government works at Thames-bank, upon the joiners' works and wood carving, and 168 upon miscellaneous works both at the building and elsewhere.—(Signed) 'Charles Barry,' Feb 1."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE

The Paris papers of Thursday bring us news of the stormy termination of the debates in the Chamber on Wednesday.

The Minister of the Interior declared the Reform dinners illegal, and his resolution that no other meetings of the kind should take place.

M Odilon Barrot exclaimed, "You are worse than Polignac and Peyronet!"

A tremendous scene ensued. The Ministerialists would not hear any more speeches. The Opposition therefore quitted their seats, and the President pronounced the discussion at an end, amid uproar, confusion, and mutual defiance.

Instead of at once resigning their functions, the Opposition Deputies had determined on going to the adjourned Reform Dinner in defiance and in procession; and that, after being refused permission to enter the banqueting-hall, they would retire. Their proceedings caused the Three per Cents to fall on Wednesday night to 74f

It is stated that the public did not yet appear to feel the perilous importance of the stormy sitting of the Chamber of Deputies on the preceding day; still the opinion generally expressed was with the Opposition.

The long annoticed funeral oration in memory of the late Mr. O'Connell, was yesterday pronounced in the church of Notre Dame, Paris, by the celebrated Abbé Lacordaire. One of our letters described it as "a most affecting, and, indeed, sublime discourse." The preacher avoided all injurious reference to this country, and took occasion warmly to eulogise the conduct of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel in respect of the Catholic Emancipation Bill Mr. John O'Connell was present, and seemed much affected.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO BUCKINGHAM PALACE

On Tuesday afternoon at a quarter before three, the Royal family and the Court left the Castle en route for the Slough station of the Great Western Railway, in six carriages and four, escorted by a subaltern's party of the Royal Horse Guards, in command of Cornet Sackville, G. L. Fox, amidst a large concourse of the most respectable of the inhabitants of Windsor, assembled on the Castle-hill to witness the departure and greet her Majesty and the Prince with respectful homage, which were gracefully acknowledged by the Queen and her Royal Consort. After passing through the towers of Windsor and Eton at a fast pace, the Royal cortège reached the Slough station precisely at three o'clock; where the Royal train, specially prepared for their reception, being in readiness, the whole reached the terminus at Paddington within the time specified for the journey. Previous to the departure of the Court, his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Duke of Saxe Coburg, and Count Arthur Mensdorff, and attended by the Hon. Captain Gordon and several other gentlemen, rode through the town on horseback to meet his Royal Highness's barriers, with their Master, General Wemyss. The meet was at Nash's Farm, Chippenham, where hares were speedily found, and after an hour's first-rate sport their Royal Highnesses rode back to the Castle, taking the road by Pocock's-lane to Datchet, for the purpose of visiting her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore Lodge, on their way to the Castle.

The health of the Duchess of Kent is very rapidly improving, under the care of Mr. Brown of Windsor, apothecary to the Royal Household. It was expected on Thursday that her Royal Highness would be able to leave Frogmore for her residence in St. James's Palace

PARISH OF ST. PAUL'S, COVENT GARDEN.—Dr. Bowers, Dean of Manchester, has intimated to the Parishioners that he has determined on resigning the Rectory of this Parish, in consequence of his duties at Manchester and the Deanery of the Collegiate Church. The same intimation having been conveyed to the Duke of Bedford, who is the patron of the living, his Grace has appointed the Rev. SUDDEN DEATH OF DR. HIGGINSON, OF POPLAR.—The Rev. Dr. Higginson, minister of the East India Chapel, Poplar, expired on Saturday morning last, under the following distressing circumstances:—About seven o'clock, while dressing himself, he suddenly exclaimed, "Oh! what a pain I have at my heart;" and, as he rapidly got worse, Mrs. Higginson sent for Mr. Bailey, surgeon, of Poplar, who promptly attended, but before he could arrive life was extinct The deceased was about sixty years of age, and had been the minister of the chapel twenty years

COPENHAGEN, JAN. 27.—The post mortem examination of his late Majesty's body has given the following results:—The great vein on the right side, which had been opened some weeks previous to his death, was found in a much inflamed state from the elbow down to the wrist, and on the left chamber of the heart was a quantity of matter, which had been deposited by the acute inflamation. Those symptoms are enough to account for his Majesty's death Besides, there was an unnatural enlargement of his heart (hypertrophy), and finally, the kidneys appeared to be affected.

ITALIAN IMPROVISATION.—The students of the University at Rome lately assisted at a solemn high mass in their collegiate chapel for their brethren slain at the university town of Pavia They had crape and cypress branches Some of the crowded assembly, observing the presence of Father Gavazzi, a celebrated preacher, surrounded him, and, carrying him on their shoulders up into the pulpit, ordered him to preach a funeral sermon for the fallen. ### PUBLIC MEETINGS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. The Annual Meeting of the members and friends of the Brond-street, West-end, and Central, London Branch of this Society, was held at the London Coffee House, Ludgate-hill, on Tuesday evening. The Rev R. MAURO, A.M., presided, and, in opening the meeting, stated that the Society, since its establishment in 1805, had circulated 39,000,000 copies of the Scriptures, in various languages, and in some of which they had never before been translated, at a cost of £3,000,000. The rev gentleman having alluded to the religious tone that pervaded the debate on the Jewish Disabilities Bill, to show that religious feeling existed in this country to a great extent, one which he ascribed, in some measure, to the agency of the Society, here feelingly, as chaplain to the City Bridewell, to the extent of ignorance and depravity that existed in the county of the place where the meeting was held, to demonstrate the necessity for continued and increased exertion in behalf of Christianity. Several resolutions approving of the views of the Society, and determinate to sustain it in its efforts, were carried after which the meeting, which was most numerously and respectably attended, separated.

ELECTION COMMITTEES. The General Committee of Elections have selected T. C. Granger, Esq., to be a member of the Chairman's Panel, in room of W. G. Hayter, Esq., who, since his appointment, has ceased to be a member of the House. The House of Commons has referred Lord G. C. H. Somerset's petition (relating to the recognizances entered into in respect of the petition against the return for Monmouth county) to the Committee appointed to inquire into Sir Wiloughby Jones's petition. To the latter Committee, also, were referred Sir J Walmsley and Mr. R. Gardner's petitions respecting the Leicester election; Mr. J Reynolds and Mr. E. Briggs's petitions relative to the Bridport election; Mr. J. Wodehouse's petition respecting the Bodmin election; Mr. R. M. Fox's petition relative to the Longford county election, and the Hon. E. R. Litherton's petition with respect to the Walsall election. The Committee is instructed by the House to inquire into the allegations of the above-mentioned petitions from the hon. gentlemen in the representative branch of the House. Mr. Attorney-General has been discharged from further attendance on the Cheltenham Election Committee, and the Solicitor-General, Mr. S. Wortley, and Mr. Hayter, have been added thereto.

COUNTRY BANK OF LONDON.—A special general meeting was held on Tuesday at the Bank, in Lothbury, for the purpose of filling up three vacancies in the direction, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. J. Skewell, Mr. Henry Canfield, and Mr George Rennie Mr. C. D. Archbold, Mr. William Cooper, and Mr. J. A. Chowne, were elected in their stead. The Chairman (Mr John Taylor) then said he felt great pleasure in stating that the progress of the Bank had been most satisfactory since the annual meeting in July last. They had existed through times most difficult and portentous: indeed, he supposed that at no period had there been such remarkable changes in the value of public securities, stocks, and the returns of property, as during the past year They had Consols at 94 and at 79; they had had Exchequer Bills at 15 and 20 premium, and they had had them at 37 discount. All great articles of commerce, such as cotton, sugar, indigo, &c., had declined in value from 25 to 40 per cent. Under these circumstances the management of the Bank had required peculiar caution, and he was happy to say that in no period, not even in October or November, had there been a diminution in their balance above 10 per cent. below the highest amount of last year. He had great pleasure in stating that for the last half-year the gross profits were as large as in the corresponding period of 1846; for, although the balance had been less, the higher interest had made up for the deficiency Since the beginning of the present year their progress had continued to be equally satisfactory, and they had, during the month of January alone, opened fifty new accounts. The statement was received with considerable applause, and was acknowledged by a vote of thanks to the Chairman and Directors. The meeting then adjourned.

METROPOLITAN EARLY CLOSING SOCIETY.—On Monday evening a meeting of assistants of all trades, concerned, was held in consideration a new scheme for the entire carrying out of the object of the association, was held, at the Mechanics' Institution, Southampton-buildings, Holborn. Mr. D. Wire took the chair, and the Secretary presented the particular general scheme to the meeting He said that the Committee, feeling convinced that the success of the early closing movement rested more with the public than with the shopkeepers, for the latter were in those early days of the former decided to be compulsory, determined on the following plan: "That a fund of not less than £1000 be raised by the following means:—1 By a general subscription among assistants 2. That a portion of every denomination be respected from the fines levied and other evils of the late-hour system, and to allow collections to be afterwards made on behalf of the association. 3 That an attractive course of lectures should be given, for which a moderate admission fee should be charged. That copies of Dr Bennett's Prize Address should be forwarded to every householder in and around the metropolis. Soon after this distribution of addresses public meetings should be held in the various districts of the metropolis. That every householder to whom the address has been forwarded should be solicited to discontinue and discountenance evening shopping. Resolutions in favour of the plan were adopted."

PROPOSED ENLARGEMENT OF ST PANCRAS WORKHOUSE. A meeting of the vestry was held on Tuesday to take into consideration the proposal to erect an additional workhouse, which, if carried into effect, will cost little short of £21,000 This proposal had been agreed to at a previous vestry. An attempt was now made to non-confirm the minutes of the previous vestry. Mr. J. B. Wright in the chair. Mr Howarth moved that the previous minutes be confirmed. Mr Morris seconded the resolution. Mr Newton Crouch opposed it The Directors, he said, had been criminally guilty of overcrowding the workhouse. Out-door relief was better both for the paupers and for the parish. Mr. Bowyer supported Mr Crouch. After some remarks from Mr. Harding and Dr. Strange, a division ensued, the result of which was a majority of twenty for building an additional workhouse. The Rev. J. M. Fitzmaurice, M.A., is elected Chaplain to the workhouse

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.

The Registrar-General's Report, from which the above summary is taken, gives some interesting details respecting the districts of London in which the epidemic prevailed to the greatest extent. These are well worthy the attention of our civic authorities who boast of the sanatory condition of the metropolis and who have so loudly resisted all attempts at improvement. Taking the deaths in each of the London districts for the six weeks from November 1 1847, to January 1, 1848, the rate of mortality was 46 to every 1000: the average during seven years from 1838 to 1844 was only 25 to every 1000, thus showing that the epidemic raised the mortality eighty per cent. "Lewisham," says the report, "including Blackheath, Sydenham, and Eltham, is one of the healthiest districts in London; the ordinary rate of mortality is 17 annually: during the epidemic it was 27. St. George-in-the-East is one of the unhealthiest districts; the ordinary rate of mortality is 29 in 1000; the rate of mortality during the epidemic was 73. The increase in Lewisham was 10, in St. George-in-the-East 44. The latter district suffered four times as much from the influenza as the former. The epidemic of influenza killed twice as many people in the insalubrious parts of London as it did in those less unhealthy. Surely such facts must open the eyes of those in authority to the necessity of looking more attentively to the cleanliness of the districts over which they have control. The return for this week gives the following:

STATUE OF MR. HUSKISSON AT LLOYD'S.—The statue of Mr. Huskisson, presented to the members of Lloyd's, by his widow, has been placed in the vestibule of that establishment. The ceremony of uncovering this statue took place and the public generally, was performed on Monday afternoon, at one o'clock precisely, by Mr. G. R Robinson, M.P., Chairman of the Committee for managing the affairs of Lloyd's, attended by the whole of the gentlemen of the Committee Mr. Robinson addressed the members in a short but pointed speech appropriate to the occasion

ST MARYLEBONE BANK FOR SAVINGS.—The eighteenth Annual General Meeting of this Institution was held on Thursday. The Rev. John Hume Spry, D.D., in the chair It appeared from the several reports read to the meeting, that 2626 new deposits had been made in the last year; 18119 deposit accounts remained open on the 30th November last; of which 13437 held balances averaging less than £3 7s. 1d. each. Upwards of £301,663 was then invested

THE BAR MEMORIAL. This document was personally presented on Tuesday by Mr. LOVAT to the Lord Chancellor. It had appended the signatures of [illegible] eminent counsel practising at the outer bar of the Court of Chancery. It is an important fact that the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice-Chancellor of England, have severally expressed, before a Committee of the House of Commons, opinions strongly favourable to the removal of the disabilities of this Court to Lincoln's-inn during such terms as Parliament is not sitting A memorial for a similar purpose as the present has also been presented to Lord Langdale from the Incorporated [illegible]

the very material increase of applications to King's College Hospital, in Portugal-street, Lincoln's-inn, the committee of that institution have benevolently augmented the benefits of the charity, by occasionally placing extra beds in the wards, and receiving the more afflicting and urgent cases. The demands upon the out-door treatment having increased to a corresponding degree, the directors at a recent meeting that the co-operation of the affluent was urgently needed to enable the continuance of the benefits of the institut

REFORMATION OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.—It appears that the operations of our oldest and principal establishment for the reformation of juvenile delinquents, the Philanthropic Society, in St. George's fields, Southwark, is about to undergo a very beneficial change, while its general utility in the prevention as well as the cure of crime is to be very considerably augmented For the latter purpose the Directors have passed resolutions authorising the Committee to erect a school or farm of industry, in the country, near some large manufacturing town. The building is to be commenced as soon as the subscriptions, which have already begun, shall reach £3000

MURDER OF A SOLDIER IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—On Friday evening, [illegible] between four and five o'clock, a private soldier of the Coldstream Guards was shot, in St. James's Park, near Storey's Gate, by a young woman, named Annette Mayers, a native of Brussels, who resided as a servant in Albion-street, Hyde-park-gardens. The unfortunate man was killed on the spot, the ball having passed through his head. The motive for this most deliberate acte of assassination is supposed to have been jealousy. She was taken into custody on the spot, and on Saturday was examined before Mr. Henry, at Bow-street, when evidence having been adduced of the prisoner's guilt, which she herself also freely admitted, the wretched woman was committed to Newgate for trial.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE HORSE-RACING FRAUD.—On Monday, a young man, named Thomas Horris, was placed at the bar, charged with obtaining £10 under false pretences from Cyrnie Lloyd, Esq., by pretend ng to disclose to him a conspiracy to effect to certain race-horses at the Goodwood Races. Mr. Huddlestone called Mr. Lloyd, who said he had received a letter, dated Pavilion-place, signed Harry Halford, offering, for £10, to give him some information relative to a conspiracy to prevent certain horses from winning the Goodwood Races. Witness wrote, saying he must know something more about the matter before he gave the £10. Witness then had an interview with the prisoner, who said his name was Alfred Halford, that the letter was written by his father, and that the plot was to drug and poison certain of the horses. The prisoner produced a letter from a man named Williams, describing the nature of a plot of this kind. At subsequent interviews the prisoner produced many other letters, written in blue and black ink, corroborating the account of the conspiracy. Witness gave the prisoner £10 to give his father, and the prisoner gave a receipt on the account of his father, for the purpose, he alleged, of bringing witnesses to London to prove the conspiracy. The prisoner cross-examined Mr. Lloyd—He told the prisoner that if he could prove the conspiracy he might very likely obtain a reward of £1000. The prisoner said he wanted no money at present All he wanted, if he proved the conspiracy, was a situation. The prisoner produced a letter, among others, signed S and four crosses. Witness might have been a little agitated at the sight of it, as he believed it recognised the handwriting.—Re-examined by Mr. Clarkson: Does not think he would have parted with his £10 if he had known that the real name of the prisoner was Thomas Harris, instead of Alfred Halford, that he had no father living, and that the letters he produced had been written by himself. Lord Henry Lennox gave evidence precisely similar to that given before the magistrate. Mr. Lloyd, at the conclusion of the above force, said, that on a certain day in January he received a letter from Mr. Lennox, and Lord Henry Lennox, and Mr. Lloyd, to Mr. Broadstreet Police Court, where, in consequence of depositions made by the prisoner a warrant was granted against certain persons. Witness, with the prisoner, went in search of these persons among cliers, of a man named Williams, whom the prisoner told him he was certain to find at a certain public-house They continued the search from twelve at noon to twelve at night, without success. Witness beginning to have some suspicion of the prisoner, told him to come to his (Shackle's) house at nine o'clock next morning. He never came. Witness went to Mr. Shackle's house, and there met the prisoner. He (witness) then told him (the prisoner) that he had found out that his real name was not Halford but Harris, and his father had been dead about [illegible] months. Witness had received no letters, and he believed the letters sent to Mr. Lloyd to be in his handwriting. A witness proved that he had never lived in Castle-street, Finsbury, whence some of the letters were dated. Mrs. Shackle deposed to the prisoner. The prisoner then addressed the Jury very shortly He had up to that time been in very bold a penance, but he felt a puncture burst into tears, and threw himself at the feet of the Jury. He was not guilty in law, he could be able to prove the conspiracy to which he had alluded, and to bring the parties to justice. The Common Sergeant summed up, and the Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." Mr. Clarkson then said that a second charge against the prisoner for perjury [illegible] prisoner, into which, however, he would not enter.—The Common Sergeant said, that was a most serious charge It was not an ordinary case of obtaining money under false pretences, but the prisoner was certainly guilty of having, with a number of servants and other persons, who solely depended upon their client for support, and he was compelled to pass a severe sentence, which was that the prisoner be transported beyond the seas for seven years.—The prisoner, on hearing the sentence, fainted away, and was carried out of the dock.

The Edinburgh papers give accounts of various meetings of the members of the National Association for the Reform of Excise Abuses. A resolution has been drawn up of the grievances inflicted by the Excise system, which statements are to be submitted to Parliament. An adequate idea will be formed of the [illegible] over which the Excise system exercises, if it be taken for granted that the parties from whom the £2,400,000 a year is extracted that is to say, distillers, maltsters, sugar-bakers, grocers, [illegible] vers, post-horse masters, and licensed dea ers, are the only parties whose business is vexatiously and injuriously interfered with by the Excise. With the view of securing revenue, every precaution and every [illegible] ingenuity, aided by the most absolute and irresponsible power, could devise, has been adopted, in the way of blockading the shops and cellars, and hampering the movements of persons who [illegible] letter to what extent, or in what manner, in articles sold, in the course of their production, to the payment of excise dues. One would naturally suppose that, after duty has been charged and paid upon spirits, the surveillance of the Excise would no longer be exercised over the article. This, however, is not the case. Never did bloodhound follow its victim with greater pertinacity than the Excise follow the spirits which have already paid the legal exaction at every corner where the cask may be drenched till the liquor reaches the dwelling-house of the consumer. The spirit merchant, for example, is "permitted" to receive from the distiller a certain quantity of duty-paid spirits. He deposits the article in his cellar, and there comes the [illegible] practice of "survey," that is to say, the inspection and measurement, by tits and starts, by Excise officers, of the dealer's stock, to see that he has not been adding to his stores unregistered spirits. Retail spirit-dealers, publicans, druggists, chemists, tobacco-dealers, and others who traffic in exciseable articles, are exposed to the same [illegible] London Telegraph.

YESTERDAY on the recurrence of his festa day, on the 17th of January, St. Antinony, the Abbot, holds at Rome at Leves, after the fashi n of temporal or even spiritual Princes; and, at the door of the church where his name and relics have succeeded that of Diana, he receives his Hege subjects—a motley tribe of horses mules, oxen, buffaloes, asses, or any other quadrupeds that may choose to pre sent themselves. ST. ANTHONY'S DAY IN ROME.

then umble for their crowns and coppers, which an acolyte proceeds to collect; for these offerings they are booked creditors for a certain number of masses, and receive by way of earnest a small print of the Saint, to be nailed up in the stables, and a diminutive brass cross to be tied to the harness.

At the close of the ceremony, the cavalcade scamper to the nearest osteria, to conclude the afternoon in libations, or for a ride round the town to show their finery, or (may be) a desperate race outside the Porta Pia. Another squadron approaches, and another; they grow thicker and thicker, till later in the day, towards twenty-two o'clock, i.e. two hours before sunset, the carriages and horses of the nobility begin to arrive. Cardinals' red coaches of the heaviest wagon-like build, and elegant equipages of Roman Princesses, drive side by side. A long retinue of his Holiness' State carriages, drawn by four and six horses, are marshalled up—dragoons guard the street—a Roman crowd, the most easily pleased of European mobs, gaze on in admiration; while the English visitors, who form no unimportant feature here in every show, throng in open carriages, and on horseback as to a race course.

At the thick of the bustle, on last St. Anthony's Day, a horse-dealer, high mounted on an English break, and smoking his cigar with an air of perfect nonchalance, insisted on driving up his eighteen horses, a la Carter, all held by two pairs of reins. This last exploit dismissed, in complete satisfaction, the crowd, and doubtless, the Priest also, who retired at dusk to his inner chapel, where all the different temptations of his patron Saint figure in plaster and fresco, there to reckon up the day's receipts and register the votive offerings.

We strolled away to the green sward in front of St. John Lateran, to see some battalions of the Civic Guard revel for the first time in the proud possession of their new French muskets, and to hear them lament over the ridiculous fact that there should not be a single percussion cap in Rome capable of fitting any of the twelve thousand muskets imported.

STEAMER STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

The accompanying engraving shows one of those terrific phenomena of the storm which present so many fine effects for the painter's art. The sketcher of the present instance was an eye-witness of the catastrophe which he has enabled us thus vividly to illustrate in our pages. The details are briefly as follows:—

It appears that the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship Indus, (J. Soy, Com.), on her late passage from Alexandria to Southampton, experienced four days' strong gale; on the latter day of which, Wednesday, Jan. 19, at 10 30 P.M., when this fine vessel was 110 miles to the eastward of Algeria, she was struck by lightning, which splintered the maintopmast pole, and tore a piece out of the fore royal pole. There was considerable alarm among the passengers, but the vessel experienced no other damage than the above. She is a noble steamer, of 450 horse-power, and is wire-rigged.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

"A MILE FROM HOME."—PAINTED BY J. HILDEBRANDT.

The artistic season may be said to re-commence on the opening of this Exhibition; and we have been used each year to visit it with an expectation of discovering the promises to pay of talent till then unknown to the metropolitan public more often raised hopes of much greater eventual accomplishment than the After industry of the artist has enabled him to achieve. A principal cause of These promises, however, have but rarely been fulfilled to their entire amount, hav-these failures is attributable to the fact that most artists, on beginning to sell their pictures, cease to think severely upon art. They become satisfied to repeat something very similar to that which they have already done, without supposing themselves sufficient of those peculiarities that make what is called manner, whether in drawing, colour, or composition. From this it arises that the earlier productions of the very pictures of a painter are, in many instances, but crude repetitions of his later productions; and the utmost beauties for which he is admired are subjected to a continual increase of alloy from the deformities for which he is condemned. We do not say this invariably; for we know that the decay of perfection in a vy work of art is a matter that may be disputed, but we say it to remind painters that, to do anything worthily in their vocation, they must consider themselves at all times as students of nature as artists, and as competitors in the race. For the good or detriment of painters as men think fit so...say on this matter; for, however the demands for their productions may have recently increased in this country, a variety of sources, among which the Schools of Design form no mean item, promise to furnish an over-abundant supply. Among such a number of pictures that claim a certain amount of consideration, in reference to mechanical skill, we do not remember to have seen so few that make pretensions to what is called high art as at the present exhibition. The Academicians may not, then, congratulate itself on the success of its endeavours when contemplating the walls of the British Institution. It does there appear that the more historical art is inquired for the more it won't come; and we are necessarily led to the conclusion that the liquify has been so conducted as rather to discourage than to promote the practice of the first class of production.

In No. 1, "A Calm after a Heavy Gale," J. Danby, A.R.A., we have an example of unfinished promise. Last is young; upon young preference for activity in art; to a determination not to depict the beautiful in nature, that reminds us pleasantly of what we have seen; but to select only those singular incidents that may evade a common-place scrutiny, by a plea of exception to those general laws by which the picturesque is governed. This subject is simply to be boats in the open sea; in the treatment of which there is a conflict between the blankness of the water, clouds, and sky, and the heavy appearance of the sails and boats. If we should say, that the effect is inconsistent with atmospheric tone, and therefore impossible, the artist would reply, that it was an effect he had witnessed. To the charge that the water has been indifferently painted, however, a like answer will not apply. If Mr Danby would look more to nature as it is, he might yet retrieve the position he formerly occupied. Here is not joy as a seascape painter.

"Near the studio, Venice." J. Holland. A richly composed clear picture, evincing a delicate perception of the harmony of colour in the artist. The parts are so balanced that the eye rejoices satisfied upon it, as a whole, in which there is nothing that it would desire to change.

3. F. Goodall. A Gipsy Family of Three Generations: the young mother, mural in an infant, who watches his elder brother teasing a raven. The husband is repose, but not sonpage, beneath the tent; and an old crone sits by, occupying the tricks of the boy; while the grandfather is absorbed by the creature comforts preparing in a cauldron, over which he has established himself as managing director. There is however, no simple material in such of the contrivance as to make it a very pleasant picture to look upon. The landscape is happy appropriate, and the distance admirably managed, without seeming anything to be compounded on a super-natural principle. We have engraved this picture, which is one of the most important works in the Exhibition.

4. [illegible] Wilkie Macdox. Very nicely painted; but we recommend the artist to go subjects of a darker cast.

5. "A Sentry outside Scutari Barracks." T. Super. A broad sketch, well composed.

11. "A Hut" from a sketch near Bolton." W. Bengal. A group of stones in a mountain brook. Very masterly and effective.

12. "Landscape—Evening—A Scene on the Mole." F. Danby, A.R.A. Rich in tone and pleasant in effect, but certainly not assisted by the episode introduced by the artist.

13. "A Birch-tree Lane, North Wales." T. Danby. This picture has an inclination towards eccentricity; but is, nevertheless, broad in treatment, and fairly composed

14. "Chain of Flowers." Victor Robert. A lady holding a garland of roses, composed in imitation of the manner of Louis XV.'s period. Animals are not often successful in art, and, least of all, those in the style of the time here referred to.

15. "The Historian, Platina, in Prison. W. Bewick. There is cleverness in this picture; though the head is deficient in mental power.

16. "The Bogged Pony." W. Shayer, Jun. A very nice subject of Highland scenery, representing a deer-stalker, arrested in his return by the overthrow of his pony under the weight of a magnificent stag with which it has been burthened. This is a very pleasing picture, and is carefully painted in its details. The head of the dead stag is very scarcely be surpassed for truth and powerful treatment; while that of the horse may claim almost an equality of praise. We are not aware that the above artist has ever given himself to his task while such a painter as Mr. [illegible]'s presence him so closely.

20. "Suspicion." T. Uwins, R.A. A very pretty picture, presenting a singular pleasantness of effect. A lady leaning by a balustrade, and watching who plays upon a harp, while an elderly nun-looking personage watches the parties with a evil eye. An extract in the catalogue informs us that "an old woman took into her wise head that the young lady was in love," and we confess to being about as wise as the old woman, for "we thought that thing." If the artist did not intend this, he should have contrived to avoid it. Indeed, the picture would have been better for the omission of the old woman, as does not assist the colour of the rest, and we cannot like to know how the artist would contrive the lower arm beneath that drapery.

21. "Ruins." H. O'Neil. A very showy painted head indeed. This artist is more happy in such subjects than where the composition is complicated. He is excellent in detail; but has not yet approached a group with sufficient force to command attention.

22. Adherents of Prince Charles Edward." G. E. Sintzenich. There is much to like in this picture; and, if its tone were not so leathery, it would be less objectionable.

27. "On the Grand Canal, Venice." J. Holland. A clever plagiarism from Turner, R.A.

32. "Head-Lane, Dorking." I. J. Soper. The sun is nicely let through the [illegible] in this picture.

36. "Showing a Horse." W. and H. Bennett. The figures are represented in the costume of Wolverhampton's period; the picture as not an unhinged way to recommend us of that artist.

38. A gorgeous picture of fruit, "Painted for Robert Vernon, Esq., to form a part of his splendid collection given by him to the nation." There is a magnificence about Mr Vernon that is truly princely; not as we find princes now, in the work-a-day world, but as we read of them in fairy tales. When we say of this picture that it worthily represents Mr. Vernon's taste in the department in which he stands alone, we can bestow upon it no higher praise.

41. "Cobs and Rosalind." C. Elder. Cleverly composed, but something weak in colour.

43 "Lorenzo and Jessica." J. E. Lauder, R.S.A. This picture demands more from us than remarks as to mere actual excellence. There is much in it and we remember few instances in which our country's poet has been illustrated more happily. Had Jessica presented to us more of the Hebrew in feature, we should have been at a loss for a flaw. The combination in colour, conformity of tone, and general effect of this picture are most admirable. The whole picture is full of grace, ease, without the slightest approach to affectation. It is, moreover, exceedingly painted throughout. Mr. Lauder seems to be of those last will build their safety points.

48. "The Morning Walk" H. O'Neil. Another deliciously painted little head.

50. "The Last Gleam before the Storm." J. Linnell. Rather a large landscape by the master; and, consequently, evidencing his powers to the very fullest extent. Neither Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Gregg, nor Mr. Weiss, seems to be masters of their parts. The two songs of the "Rose" and the "Rat," were quite a mistake on the part of Mr. Sims Reeves, for the charming, and the second part terminated with the double chorus of soldiers, in six-eight time, and the audience in two-four, amidst a perfect furore, the composer being called for by band and audience.

The scene so admirably sung by Madame Dorus Gras, from the opera of "Benvenuto Cellini," opening the third part, was chiefly a vocal exercise. The broken and plaintive effect of the opening, of the song is pungently, whilst the orchestra is exhausted in every form of accompaniment, formed one of the most exquisite streams of lamentation we have ever heard. As in Paris, the wail for the dead appeared to penetrate the house's core, and the finale to the first Philharmonic Symphony, it is positively astounding. The recitative played on the alto trombone, by Koenig, is a most touching strain of musical eloquence; the bassoon glides in with marvellous effect; and then, as the brass instruments come in gradually, the interest becomes more intense, and finally superb combinations of harmony break on the ear, until the whole attains an overwhelming climax. The applause was vehement, and the composer again called for.

...erior conductor, the concert with the greatest energy and precision; there were few hitches, and but one of any moment, arising from the misapprehension of the Chorus Master.

To the wreath which encompassed Berlioz's brow he has added another laurel — he has acquired the suffrages of musical England. If there be carping critics who write of obscurity and difficulty, of a want of rhythm, and a disregard of conventional forms—Berlioz will only participate in the fate of Beethoven at the appearance of the instrumental innovations of the Viennese composer, whose symphonies, both in Paris and London, were proclaimed to be wild and incoherent. The hostility begun in France to Berlioz has now nearly subsided especially since musical Germany pronounces in his favour. The Beethoven Quartett Society and the Philharmonic Society, under Costa's bâton, made a second Mass in D quite comprehensible. It is, in fact, a question of effective execution—let there be executants to interpret, and the orchestral genius of Berlioz cannot be subject, for he has not for sake of the [illegible] ...ne in advance of Gluck and Beethoven, and distanced his living competitors.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.

The third meeting of the sixteenth season took place on Monday at the London Tavern, and there was a crowded room. Part first opened with Hummel's second Mass. The solo singers were Miss M. Williams (Contralto), Miss Hessent, Messrs W Seguin and Machin The "Jphegania" overture, of Gluck, was announced, but Beethoven's "Promethens" was substituted. Mr. Lockey was encored in Lachner's song "Where Midnight's Darkest Veil," the horn obligato to which was nicely played on the alto by Mr. Dando. Master Alexander Ruckebusch, a boy eight years of age, astonished the amateurs by his neat and prettyexecution of De Berlot's seventh air with variations. He is a delicate looking child, but has a very intelligent countenance, and what is most extraordinary in his playing is that he plays left handed. He was much and deservedly applauded, but we hope that the forcing system will not be pursued with such a promising talent. The cantata of "St. Cecilia's Day," by the Dutch composer, Van Bree, terminated the scheme. It contains some pleasing music and effective choruses, the finale "Holy Music" being perhaps the best. The next meeting will be on March 6th.

Mr. Allcroft has announced his eleventh Annual Concert for Tuesday next at Drury-Lane. Among the artistes engaged are Madame Anna Thilon, Birch, Lanza, Poe, Duval, Novello, Bodda, Alberiazy, Ernst, and Mrs. Alban Croft; Messrs. Harrison, Reeves, Lucller, Brizzi, H. Phillips, Marras, Labiache, Genge, and Mr. Henry Russell; and the eight singers of the Pyrenees.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

PARIS, Thursday.

Benedict has passed through this capital, on his way to London, after having produced with extraordinary success his opera of the "Crusaders," at the Hoftheater, in Stuttgart, on the 3rd ult. He conducted at three performances, the last of which was given expressly on that occasion. His Majesty presented Benedict with a gold snuff-box, set in diamonds, with the portrait of the King. The Augsburgh Gazette of the 28th, and the Stuttgart papers, contain elaborate criticisms of this production, which was originally produced at Drury-Lane Theatre, under Mr. Bunn's management. The libretto of M. St. Georges and Mr. Bunn is praised highly. The opera was mounted with great splendour, and in the new German manner, was divided into five acts, and much more prominence given to the character of the Man of the Mountain (Harzan), which was sustained by Pischek, for whom Benedict composed additional music, diminishing that of the Baldwin (Staudigl) to the standard of Stentor. Madame Dahn was Adone, and Mdlle Waldhausen Isolde. Benedict was called for nightly at the end of almost every act, and vociferously cheered. As a native of Stuttgart, and the favourite pupil of Weber, and, moreover, the composer of the "Virgin's Warning" and "Brides of Venice," the local writers are justly proud of Benedict. The originality and sweetness of the melodies, the rich and broad harmonies, and the colouring of the whole, have excited the admiration of the Germans for the Chester Cup; and a strong feeling against the Stinger, for the Derby; were the only movements this afternoon. Business was extremely dull.

"T. W. B." "Argus."—In sending diagrams for solution, be good enough always to distinguish the White and Black men, by adding the initial "W." or "B." to every piece. We have not the solution of No 267 at hand, but it shall be given.

"A. D. A."—According to the absurd regulation upon the subject of drawn games in this country, you would still be entitled to claim the first move.

LITERATURE.

POPULAR FIELD BOTANY. By AGNES CATLOW. Reeve, Benham, and Reeve. The high price of this book is to some extent compensated by the beauty of its engravings in Botany, enabling them, with little difficulty, to discover the scientific names of the common plants they may find in their country rambles; to which are appended a few facts respecting their uses, habits, &c. The work is suited to both the Linnean, or artificial, and the natural, system of classification, that either may be pursued. The plants are classed in months, the illustrations are nicely coloured, and the book is, altogether, an elegant as well as useful holiday present.

THE HISTORIC LANDS OF ENGLAND. By J. BERNARD BURKE, Esq. Charton.

This handsome library volume comprises historical and descriptive accounts of Chiefdens, Bentley, Chatsworth, Hardwick, Eridon, Morsley, Haddon Hall, Rothschild, Wentworth, Nettleton, Normanton, Charlton House, Lathom House, &c., all ancestral halls "famous in story," and rife with interest for every class of readers. The work abounds with genealogical anecdote, and topographical details, carefully given; and liberally illustrated with lithographic views.

THE CHRONICLES OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, SPAIN, &c. By SIR JOHN FROISSART. 2 Vols. Burns.

This is a popular edition of "the treasures of the immortal Froissart," condensed, but popularised by Notes and Illustrations. We need hardly say that the book is a charming one for young persons; while, as a work of humanising influence than mere entertainment. The Tales are preceded by an introductory chapter on Chivalry, the present efforts of which were never more proper yesterday, by Sir Walter Scott, he says: "Every age must be modified according to the general feeling of respect to the female sex; in the rules of forbearance and decorum in society; in the duties of speaking truth and observing courtesy; and in the general character and assurance, that as no man can encroach upon the property of another without accounting to the laws, so none can infringe on his personal honour, be the difference of rank what it may, without subjecting himself to personal responsibility." The volumes are embellished with spirited frontispieces by Tenniel.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF FACTS -1848. Compiled by JOHN TIMBS. Bogue.

Taking for his motto the remark of the President of the British Association that every fact, properly so designated, is welcome to the man of science, the Editor of the "Year-Book" proceeds upon the, by no means unamusing or unimportant, plan of records of contemporary improvement and discovery. The first page chronicles the success of the Double Action Printing Machine, a large one having been constructed for the working of the new daily newspaper, the London Telegraph. Among the other contents of the Mechanical section of the "Year" are was find railway matters, grippers, whistles, locomotives, of telegraphs; locomotives, Hillpatian and gigantic, the principal steam-engine novelties of the past year; the great engineering works, house ventilation and drainage, and other sanitary measures. Tides and Waves lead off in Natural Philosophy; the barometric and magnetic phenomena of the past year, very remarkable, by the way, are next recorded. new production and application of light; the philosophy of heat, and some striking facts favouring the theory of central fire in the earth; and some interesting observations in climatology and physical geography; are also to be found in this Section. In Electrical Science, the chronicled Facts tend to strengthen the theory of its universality; although the portion of this section most sought for will be the Electro-telegraph Progress, recorded in several pages of closely-packed data and statistics In Chemical Science, the new Tests and Processes are detailed; and, the Photographic improvements, and Gun-cotton experiments will be found in the Section. Gun-cotton, by the way, is already blown out of the field, by Nitric Mannite, a body produced by the action of nitric acid on mannas. In Zoology, De Blainville's autography of the Rhinoceros, the receipt of a pair of Axolis from the Emperor of Russia, the Dodo discussion of last year at Oxford, and the finding of the Eggs of the Dinornis (rivalling Sinbad's great bird's nest), are among the foremost attractions; and there are some novelties respecting Australian animals. In Botany, the Gutta Percha plant flourishes; of the Kerguelen Island Cabbage we learn that it is one of the eighteen specimens of the Antarctic flora, seen by Ross growing from the sea-beach to the mountain top; its flower spike is often two feet high, the root tastes like horse-radish, and the heart mustard-and-cress; it contains much essential oil, and, therefore, does not produce hairborn, as our pot-herbs are apt to do: it proved a treasure for the crew of the Erebus and Terror, who, for 130 days, required no fresh vegetable but this. In Geology, the Glacier progress is chronicled; the mineral wealth of Australia is glanced at; and, among the records of Fossils, a paper by the Marchioness of Hastings is the most striking: it relates to the Crocodilian, Palæotherian, and other remains of the Hordle Cliffs, Hants; of the former, a specimen is named after the Marchioness. The Astronomical and Meteorological year has been a very remarkable one; as the records of the Great Solar Eclipse of October 9, the discoveries of New Planets, observations of a brilliant Aurora, and Dr. Armstrong's Meteorological Summary, attest. The volume closes with a Necrological List; for here, as elsewhere, "last of all comes death."

The Frontispiece to the "Year-Book" is a portrait of Baron Humboldt, the second volume of whose "Cosmos" has just appeared. Humboldt, by the way, is a collector of facts, which he brings within the grasp of his vigorous mind in the true spirit of philosophy; he is now in his seventy-eighth year, and we hope will long be spared to continue to illumine the world with his brilliant researches.

PUBLIC FEELING IN ITALY.—On the 29th ult., the Neapolitan war-steamer, the Nettuno, put in at Leghorn to renew her provision of coals. The sight of the Neapolitan flag created the greatest excitement. The population declared that the detachment could not be complied with, and a report having prevailed that the King of Naples was on board, a deputation of individuals manifested an intention to seize the vessel. In the meantime, a deputation waited on the Marquis di Ridolfi, who was then at Leghorn, to apprise him of the disposition of the people; but, after some discussion, it was finally agreed between the Minister and the deputation that the Neapolitan vessel should be supplied with coal. Mr. Ridolfi immediately published a proclamation, in which he appealed to the humanity of the people; but the latter were deaf to the intreaty, and the civic guard, finding occasion cause with them, Mr. Ridolfi hastened to send the commander of the port on board the Nettuno, to tell the captain to get under sail, and quit the harbour. The sea ran high, the wind was violent, and no sentiment of humanity could conquer the hatred of the people, who little suspected that the ex Minister of Police, del Carretto, was on board. A letter from Genoa, of the 1st instant, states, that M. del Carretto, having had the imprudence to land in that harbour, had been recognised, and pelted by insults, and menaced. He intended to proceed to Turin, but the Consul of Naples having apprised him of the danger attending such a journey, he returned on board the steamer, which the people would have boarded had not the captain weighed anchor at once. The Consul of Naples, in order to calm the multitude, was obliged to appear at his balcony, and join in the cry of "The people of Sicily for ever!"

NATIONAL DEFENCE.—The Oxford Chronicle publishes the following letter from Sir John Burgoyne, in answer to a letter from a Mr. Cardwell, which had appeared in that journal:—"84, Pall-mall, London, Feb. 9, 1848.—SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 22nd January, respecting our state of National Defence. I regret to read the tone of censure you adopt with regard to the opinion of the Duke of Wellington, who, to say the least of it, is as likely to be correct in his judgment as most men. It is manifestly out of the question to think of providing for the security of the country by the constant maintenance of an adequate army; and the consideration is, what would be the least expensive and least inconvenient manner of rendering a sufficient number of our population competent to the object, whenever the emergency shall arise to render their services necessary. Whether your proposition is the best for the purpose, I am not prepared to investigate. The first consideration, however, with regard to any system must be, that it should be thoroughly effective; and the second, to carry it out at the least possible cost. Sir, your obedient servant, J. F. BURGOYNE.—Jos. Cardwell, Esq."

NEW CHURCH, OLD-STREET-ROAD—ST. LUKE'S.

NEW CHURCH, OLD-STREET, ST. LUKE'S.

This new Church has lately been completed from the designs of Mr. B. Ferrey; and is an excellent specimen of modern church building. It is in the Early English style, and, as may be seen by our View, exteriorly presents the novel feature of the tower and spire rising proudly from the ground, and projecting forwards in plan, from the side of the Church. The tower and spire, which together are 125 feet high, are of noble design and proportions. The tower is divided by string-courses into four stories; in the lower is an arched doorway, having a weather moulding, terminated by two heads.

In the second story are plain windows of two lights, having a quatrefoil in their heads: the third story has, on each face of the tower, two narrow single-light windows; and the upper story an arcade of five arches, the three central ones being pierced for the belfry windows, above the central openings are three quatrefoils, pierced, and the tower is finished by a deep moulding, supported by a corbel table, having grotesque heads and ornaments sculptured on it. The spire is octagonal, and has twelve windows in it; the four lower ones consisting of two lights each, and having quatrefoils in their gabled heads. At each angle of the tower are buttresses of four weatherings. At the north-west corner of the tower is a turret staircase. The body of the church is divided longitudinally into four compartments, one of which is occupied by the tower, and the others are separated by buttresses. Each compartment has an arcade of four arches, supported by pillars, the central ones pierced for windows, and resting on a deep moulding, which is carried round the buttresses. The ends of the church have windows of single and double lights, and circular windows in the gables. The gables are all terminated by crosses.

In the interior, the Church is divided into nave and aisles by pillars carrying arches; and the roofs are open and of stained wood. The roof of the nave is about 40 feet high to the apex of the gable. The seats are open, and give accommodation to 1000 persons; and the sittings are free. There is a gallery on the west side of the Church only. The font is of stone.

The builder of this Church was Mr. Holland, of the late firm of Winsland and Holland

There is some difficulty respecting an assignment of a district to this Church; on which being settled, the Consecration will take place.

DEVONSHIRE SILVER SAFETY BROOCH.

This Brooch has lately been registered by its inventor, Mr. H. S. Ellis, of Exeter, and has been patronised by her most Gracious Majesty, who, on Saturday last, was pleased to purchase a Brooch of the above design, with four others of different patterns,—all made of Devonshire silver.

The Brooch has the customary pin, which is protected by a sheath at the back; and when as much of the dress or shawl as is necessary is taken up by this pin, when the attached chain with the tassel is drawn closely, and, being let drop, secures it.

The Brooch which we have engraved, in pattern, represents Dartmouth Castles, which are situated on each side of the river Dart. When the Royal Squadron anchored in Dartmouth Harbour, on her Majesty Visit, in 1840, the Queen was seen sketching these Castles; and this circumstance suggested to the inventor of the Brooch the choice of these old fortresses for his design. Thus, the material is the produce of Devonshire, and the subject represents some of its architectural curiosities. These, by the way, are the ruins of Kingswear Castle, and the Fort and Church of St. Petroch, where a battery has been erected.

At the same time that the above Brooch was shown to Prince Albert, the inventor, Mr. Ellis, presented to his Royal Highness a piece of smelted silver, and a piece of the ore from which the silver is extracted, which the Prince was pleased to accept as a specimen of the mineral produce of the county of Devon.

Steam Communication with the Continent.—The Railway from Boulogne to Paris will be opened for traffic throughout the whole distance on the 15th of next month. There will be five through trains from Boulogne to Paris each day, and a corresponding number of through trains from Paris to Boulogne. At present it is intended that the departures from Boulogne shall be 4 A.M., 9 A.M., 11 A.M., 3 P.M., and 9 P.M. From Paris the trains are intended to start at 8 A.M., 9 A.M., 12 at noon, 4 P.M., and 7 P.M. The train leaving Paris at 9 A.M. is to be an express train, to perform the distance to Boulogne in five hours and 20 minutes; so also the train starting from Boulogne at 3 P.M.; this is to be an express train, and to reach Paris in five hours and twenty minutes. An express steamer, in union with a train from London-bridge, will leave Folkestone to convey passengers to the train to start from Boulogne at three o'clock in the afternoon; this arrangement will enable the public to breakfast in London, and be in Paris the same day at 20 minutes past 8 P.M. So, also, between Paris and London there will be a special steamer in union with the trains leaving Paris at eight in the morning, this steamer will start from Boulogne for Folkestone on the arrival of the train, by which means passengers of that morning from Paris will arrive in London at half past six o'clock the same afternoon. Passengers will be enabled to book through this whole journey by one payment at London-bridge station; so, also, at the Paris, Amiens, and Boulogne stations, and it is most probable that, ere long, a system will be adopted by which passengers may book in connexion with all the leading continental rail ways arrangements with that view are, we believe, now under consideration.

Population of Italy.—A statistical account of the population of Italy, up to the end of last year, gives the following results:—The two Sicilies, 8,566,900; Piedmont and Sardinia, 4,879,000; Roman States, 2,877,000; Tuscany and Lucca, 1,700,700; Monaco, 7,586; St. Marino, 7,000; Modena, 483,000; Parma and Piacentia, 477,000; Venetian Lombardy, 4,755,000; Italian Tyrol, 622,608; Istria, 483,000. Total, 24,557,238.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

In Portsmouth Dockyard there is at present shown a working model of a "peril indicator," to denote the approach of ships and steamers, the invention of Lieutenant Westbrook, R.N. (1826), of the Stag, revenue cruiser, on the Ryde district. The apparatus is almost too simple to describe; it is fitted to the keel of the vessel and consists of a projection therefrom of two bars ten feet below the keel of the vessel; immediately these bars, which are fitted forward as well as aft, touch ground, they spring up level with the keel and ring a large bell in the engine-room, which is the signal for the engineer to instantly reverse the engines and send the ship astern. The invention has met with the approval of some of the members of the Admiralty and every scientific naval or other person who has seen it. A trial would fully demonstrate its usefulness and applicability; its expense is too trivial to be an obstacle.

Launch of the "Vivid" Steam-packet.—The Vivid steam-packet was launched at Chatham on Monday, at a quarter before two, in the presence of Captain Superintendent Sir T. Bourchier, and the principal officers of the yard, and numerous naval and military officers. The ceremony of naming was performed by Miss Lang, daughter of Mr. O. W. Lang, the designer of the Vivid. The principal dimensions, &c., of the Vivid are as follow (as ordered):—Length between perpendiculars, 180 feet; ditto keel, for tonnage, 136 feet 9½ inches; breadth, extreme, 22 feet 1 inch; ditto moulage, 21 feet 6 inches; depth in hold, 11 feet 4 inches; burthen in tons (old rule), 352 18-94; ditto new, 235.33; engine-room, 108 feet 9 inches; register tonnage, 125-54; draught of water forward, 3 feet 9 inches; ditto aft, 4 feet 7 inches; broke in launching, 6ths of an inch.

The "Avenger" Subscription.—The subscriptions received at Portsmouth, on account of the widows and orphans of the late crew of the lost Avenger, already amount to a considerable sum; and it has been determined, with the view to relieve or alleviate present distress, to pay on account to those persons to whom the crew had made allotments of their pay, at that place, money equal to the amount of the said allotments for the month of January. There are about sixty claimants at Portsmouth. The money is to be paid on Saturday (this) morning, at ten A.M., at the Royal Naval College, under the superintendence of a Committee. Arrangements will be made, through the Custom House, for paying those allotments made at other ports namely, about twenty at Devonport, and about twenty at the eastern ports. Subscriptions are coming in from different men-of-war. The Orion has subscribed £60. The ordinary and other vessels of war, and ships fitting at Portsmouth, are all about subscribing to the fund, which no doubt will amount to a very considerable sum. Several high and distinguished officers in London have formed themselves into a Committee for the purpose of obtaining relief, and contributions are received for the purpose by Messrs. Ommanney and Co., 39, Charing-cross.

The Army.—The 11th Hussars, at Coventry, move to Hounslow, and the 12th, or Royal Lancers, at Hounslow, embark for Dublin. The Queen's Bays, at Newbridge, will embark at Belfast for Edinburgh. The 3rd Dragoon Guards, at Edinburgh, march to Nottingham; 4th, at Nottingham, to Coventry; and 8th, at York, to Birmingham, to succeed the 1st Dragoon Guards. The 1st, or King's Dragoon Guards, at Birmingham, will embark at Liverpool for Dublin. The 1st or Royal Dragoons, at Cahir and Limerick, will move to Dublin in June, to embark for Liverpool, and proceed to York. The 46th, on arriving from North America, replace the 14th at Portsmouth. The 54th, now on passage to Barbadoes from Malta, had only two years duty in the Mediterranean, and were not in the West Indies since 1812

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

This distinguished composer was born in France, at La Cote, St. André (Isère), in 1803. He is the son of a physician of some eminence, and was sent to Paris after he had completed his studies, to enter the law. At twenty years of age, scarcely knowing his notes, and only playing on the guitar and flageolet, he became impassioned for music, and such was the spell on his senses, that he engaged himself as a chorus singer at the Theatre des Gymnase, and then entered himself as a pupil at the Conservatoire, giving mortal offence to his family, his father resenting the act by depriving him of the means of subsistence. As a pupil, Berlioz had a complete fit for his ambition; he had practical knowledge of Art. He was resolved to be a composer—Gluck had fixed his brain Beethoven had inspired him, by inspiration was master of science, and was resolved to be the master spirit of an orchestra. A musician, says one of his biographers, he would be—but in his own way. He would submit to no learning of chords and scales, and the movement of parts—to no step by step mastery of the nomenclature of a progressive and complicated science. Vague ideas of the grandeur of Gluck and Beethoven—vague resolutions to start where they left off—to dispense with the forms he would never trouble himself by learning how to follow—seem to have been his ruling principles. In 1828, he gained the second prize at the Institute—in 1830 he won the first for a scena called "Sardanapalus;" and then, as a pensioner of the Government, he went to Rome. In after years he covered the Institute with ridicule in his book "Voyage Musicale."-

M. HECTOR BERLIOZ.

When he returned to Paris, Berlioz became alternately a critic and a composer—here, venting a flood of vitriolic sarcasm, or a flight of high-toned poetry—there, elaborating a march or a scherzo—by wielding now the pen, now the bâton, with a wild and chivalrous devotion to both. He has been for some years the eloquent and powerful critic of the Journal des Débats, and in the Revue et Gazette Musicale has been the constant contributor of witty and sparkling articles. His first works were a Mass for Four Voices, the Overture to "Waverly," the Overture to the "Francs Juges," a "Concerto de Sylphes," a "Symphonie Fantastique," Overture to the "Tempest" of Shakespere, scenes from Goethe's "Faust," adaptation of Moore's "Melodies," Dramatic Symphony of "Romeo and Juliet;" Overture to the "Carnival of Rome," the grand opera of "Benvenute Cellini;" the "Harold" Symphony; the Triumphal Symphony, composed on the removal of the remains of the July heroes to the Column of the Bastile; Overture to "King Lear," the lyric drama of "Faust," &c. M. Berlioz also adapted for the Académie Royale Weber's "Der Freyschutz," composing the recitatives for the spoken dialogue in the original German opera.

In 1833, Berlioz was married to Miss Smithson, the celebrated English actress. The origin of this union was as romantic as the musical career of Berlioz. When she appeared in Paris, with the English company, he saw her—a spectator merely, in the pit, in the character of Juliet. He said, in raptures, to a friend, "That actress shall be my wife, and that play shall suggest to me the subject of a grand musical work." Both prophecies were fulfilled within a few years. At the production of his "Harold Symphony," Paganini was present. The next day, Berlioz received from him the annexed letter:—

My dear Friend.—Beethoven being dead, there remains only Berlioz who can replace him; and I, who have heard with delight your divine compositions, worthy of a genius such as yours, think it my duty to beg you to accept, as a proof of my profound respect, twenty thousand francs, which will be handed to you by Baron Rothschild on your presenting the inclosed.

Ever your friend,

Paris, Dec. 18, 1838. Nicolo Paganini.

Jules Janin, in one of the most beautiful Feuilletons he has ever penned, recorded the above fact, so honourable to Paganini, for the latter was not personally acquainted with Berlioz before this generous gift.

Berlioz has visited Brussels, Mayence, Frankfort, Stuttgart, Mannheim, Weimar, Brunswick, Hamburg, Berlin, Hanover, Darmstadt, Vienna, Munich, Moscow, Warsaw, St. Petersburg, &c., and has given concerts, at which his own works were played, with signal success. He has been offered, and has refused, the post of Director of the Italian Opera in Paris. On the accession of MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan, they asked Berlioz to accept the direction of the choral department of the Académie Royale de Musique, but he had accepted the post of chef d'orchestre at Drury Lane Theatre. It is to be regretted that he had not been nominated Musical Director, for which he is so eminently qualified; such an appointment would have been better for himself and better for the interests of the lyric drama.

On Monday last, his Concert took place, a notice of which will be found elsewhere. Berlioz is universally liked and respected. He is an excellent classic scholar, a choice wit, and full of fine enthusiasm.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF AULD SCOTLAND.

BIRTH-PLACE OF THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

In one of the pleasantly secluded valleys of the forest of Ettrick, in Selkirkshire, and in the humble dwelling shown in our illustration, was born James Hogg, commonly called the Ettrick Shepherd in 1772; and, as he latterly boasted, on the 25th of January, the birth-day of the poet Burns; although that date seems to have been opposed both to his own previous statements, and to other evidence. Hogg's forefathers had been shepherds for many generations, and in this condition James and his three brothers were all brought up. The Ettrick Shepherd first began, he tells us, to be known as a maker of songs among the rustic population of his native district, in 1796, at which time he was a shepherd in the service of Mr. Laidlaw, of Blackhouse. Here we have another coincidence, for that was the very year in which Burns died. It was in the summer of 1801, while he was still with Mr. Laidlaw, that he was discovered by Walter Scott, then engaged in collecting materials for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border."

As we hold in great respect the "homes and haunts" of genius, we regret to learn that Hogg's birth-place, at Ettrick, has been entirely demolished; and the only remaining mark of its site is a large blue stone in a wall, which the builders have inscribed with the Poet's initials. However, the accompanying Illustration shows the cottage, surrounded by the peculiar round-topped hills of the pastoral district wherein was cradled the Ettrick Shepherd, and amidst whose mountain seclusion was nurtured the genius of this true Poet of Nature

MR. BROOKE AS "SIR GILES OVERREACH."

SINCE we last wrote, Mr. Brooke has been repeating the character of Sir Giles Overreach at the Olympic Theatre, and with excellent effect, to good houses. The sketch is taken in the last act, where Sir Giles is gradually overwhelmed by the successive triumphs of his antagonists, and defeat of his own schemes of aggrandisement.

MR. G. V. BROOKE AS "SIR GILES OVERREACH."

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

In no former year, independently of the Royal boxes, which, of course, retain their august tenants, was the number of subscribers so great and distinguished at this very early period of the season.

An opera of Verdi, followed immediately by one of Donizetti, will usher in the season. "Ernani" will be the opera performed on the opening night, and will be followed by a new ballet, composed by M. Paul Taglioni. The following will be the cast of "Ernani":—Carlo Quarto, Signor Gardoni; Silva, Signor Biletta; Ernani, Signor Cuzzani; Donna Sol, Signor Cruvelli.

Signor Cuzzani is the new tenor. Signor Biletta is another debutant on our stage, but of considerable repute abroad. A baritone who has constantly acted with Mdlle. Lind, and of whom the great Swedish vocalist has conveyed the most favourable opinion. Mdlle. Cruvelli is young, handsome, and of highly dramatic figure and bearing, and possesses a very powerful voice.

The new ballet is entitled "Floretta," of which the two heroines are Caroline Rosati and Marie Taglioni. That portion of the ballet which does not take place in the realms of imaginary space, has for its seat in the nether world, Sicily. In it occur the "Palermitan," and other characteristic dances of that romantic country.

The orchestra will consist of 92 instrumentalists. Amongst these performers there are, first, the younger of the sterling instrumentalists of the old orchestra—such as MM. Nadaud, Tulbecque, Pigott, Watts, &c. In the second place, there are the remarkable professors engaged last—MM. Platti [illegible], Lanzicki, Zelas, Deloffre, Fliett, Horton, Bull, Perceval, Crouch, [illegible], Praeger, &c. In the third place, the following are the [illegible] added this year:—Violins, MM. Cooper, Jacquin, Reneneer, Collins, Kreutzer, &c. Mr. Oury will lead the second violins. Leader of the tenors, Mr. Richard Hughes, lately leader of the Drury-Lane orchestra. Amongst the tenors we see the names of Mr. Boden, Mr. Calkin, and the well-known Capell Meister, Herr Ganz, &c. M. Remmet, of the Académie de Musique, the favourite pupil of Toulon, will be first flute; and picolo, Mr. George King; first clarionet, Signor Biletta, of the Teatro Communale of Bologna; alto primo, Mr. Mayrock; first horn, Herr Steighta, from Frankfort; alto primo Herr Carl Kreutzer; first trombone, Mr. Winterbottom; tympani, Mr. Isla, of the Opéra Comique. Herr Hetterman, from the Opera Vienna, is engaged as one of the violoncellos, besides other performers of eminence.

The ensuing season at her Majesty's Theatre appears to present the brightest prospect. A letter from Stockholm conveys intelligence from Jenny Lind, whose health and spirits appear to be rendered more buoyant than ever by the heartlong enthusiasm of her countrymen, but who appears to look forward to her approaching meeting with her English admirers with undiminished pleasure.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The prospectus for the season 1848, just issued, contains the ratification of the engagement of Signor Corrado-Setti, the basso. We remark also some additional names in the Ballet, namely Mdlle Wurthier, from the Scala; and the nomination of Signor Casati as an additional maitre-de-ballet. The season is announced to commence on Tuesday, March 7, with Rossini's opera seria of "Tancredi," Madame Persiani being the Amenaide, and Mdlle. Alboni Tancredi. A new airy ballet, for Flora Fabbri, by Signor Appiani, the music by Binetta, is to be produced the opening night. In the same month Mdlle Alboni will appear in Rossini's "Cenerentola." In April, Grisi will sing, for the first time, in Donizetti's "Favorita:" Mario, Ronconi, and Marini, being included in the cast. For Mdme. Castellan, Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" will be mounted, Mario being the Arnold. In the month of May, Mdme. Pauline Garcia Viardot (the gifted sister of Malibran) will make her first appearance, either in the "Sonnambula," or in Rosina, in "Il Barbière." An entirely new répertoire is to be produced for this vocalist, which will include Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," expressly adapted and curtailed for this occasion, the cast comprising Madame Castellan, Mdlle. Alboni, Mario, Marini, Tamburini, Tagliafico, &c.; Beethoven's "Fidelio;" Costa writing the recitatives to replace the spoken dialogue in the original opera; Gluck's "Iphegenia en Tauride," in which Ronconi will appear as Oreste; Auber's opera of "Haydee," in which M. Roger, the French tenor, will make his début, &c. Costa's band now numbers sixteen first violins, with Sainton as principal; fifteen second violins, with Ella as principal; ten tenors, with Hill as principal; ten violoncellos, with the patriarch Lindley as principal; ten double basses, with the veteran Anfossi at the head; two harps, with twenty-one wind instruments, drums, &c.; in all, eighty-four distinguished professors, independently of the military band, directed by Mr. Godfrey, of the Coldstream Guards. For the Chorus there are forty ladies' and fifty-four male voices—ninety-four in all. It is obvious, from the above arrangements, that Grand Opera will be the principal object aimed at by the management, although we perceive that a comic actress of great celebrity in Italy has been [illegible], namely, Mdlle. Zoja, the original representative of Maria, in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento."

HAYMARKET.

"The Soldier's Daughter"—abridged, and, consequently, improved—was revived at the Haymarket, on Tuesday evening. It is, however, one of the class of "fine old standard comedies" which we have hopes, before long, of seeing allowed to slumber on their shelves for good; a destiny they would have enjoyed long ago, most probably, but for their occasional resuscitation, to do melancholy duty on "off nights" at the Haymarket. It was, on this occasion, exquisitely performed, with but one exception. Mr. Farren as Governor Heartlark, Mr. Keeley as Timothy, and Mrs. Nisbett as the Widow Cheerly, were, each and all, inimitable. The Haymarket company, however, lacks a jeune premier sadly. We question whether an acknowledged comedy writer would like to trust the character of the leading young man to the present representative.

"The Wife's Secret," as we anticipated, continues a most triumphant career, and forms the topic of theatrical conversation, not only in the dramatic world, but in private society amongst those classes who principally support our theatres as paying audiences. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by a large party, honoured the performance with their presence on Wednesday. This interesting play has, if anything, improved upon successive representations. The excellent acting of Mrs. Charles Kean is beyond all praise—never was such a touching impersonation of woman's most graceful attributes exhibited, as in the Lady Arundel. It is a performance of rare merit: every phrase is interpreted with the most delicate intelligence; and the lively sympathy that she excites in the minds of the audience is even a higher and more valuable tribute to her genius, than the praise of the critic. Mr. Kean's rough Puritan soldier, is also played in a masterly and effective manner, the various passions that wage war by turns in his breast being finely delineated. They have been fortunate in getting so clever a piece for the display of their powers; and Mr. Lovell has reason, in his turn, to congratulate himself upon having two such eminent artists to embody his principal characters.

LYCEUM.

A trifle called "Astounding Phenomena" was produced here on Monday evening. It is too slight for criticism, but serves Mr. Charles Mathews to rattle through a lively part with his most extraordinary volubility, which so amuses and astonishes his audience that they have no time to think of anything else but what they hear, and scarcely sufficient to understand that. The "Golden Branch," and "Box and Cox," still keep their place in the bills, and those who have not witnessed their representation will do well to be present at one of them, or even more. The extravaganza, in the beauty of its detail and gorgeous scenic effects, far exceeds anything that we have yet seen away from the Porte St. Martin Theatre, in Paris. Our readers may remember that on its first representation we expressed our opinion that it would outrun all its contemporary Christmas pieces, and it is doing so. The songs are nightly encored.

Mr Harley and Mr. Buckstone, in "Box and Cox," display most admirable fooling. They have introduced several new "gags" on successive performances, which bring down roars of laughter—not the least amusing being the one in which Box terms Cox (the hatter) a "castormonger." The boxes are nightly crowded with elegant and distinguished company.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The attractive and graceful Mdlle. Nathalie has made her appearance at the St. James's Theatre, in a very ingenious piece, called "La Vicomtesse Lolotte," playing a grisette of the time of Louis Quatorze, who has been married to a gentleman of the Court, and baffles all the stratagems of his family and noble associates to effect a separation between her and her husband. It is next to impossible to follow the plot through all its action; but it ends very satisfactorily to the lady, all her antagonists owning themselves beaten. The character found a very intelligent and lively interpreter in Mdlle. Nathalie.

MARYLEBONE.

Sheridan Knowles's play of the "Wrecker's Daughter" has been revived at this theatre, more, however, we suppose for the purpose of allowing Mrs. Warner to appear in her original character, which she renders exceedingly effective, than from any intrinsic merit in the piece itself. It has been placed upon the stage with the same attention towards accomplishing a perfect mise en scène that distinguishes every representation at this house—the scenery not being confined to a simple pair of painted flats, but arranged with admirable mechanical and constructive effect wherever the opportunity occurs. The melodramatic character of the "Wrecker's Daughter" may possibly cause it to be received with favour by the audiences of this division of London.

THE LEAMINGTON GRAND STEEPLE CHASE.

BEYOND all others, we are a people of method; methodical in our profits and losses: method-ical in our beliefs and doubts: methodical in our pains and pleasures. Thus, apropos of our last proposition, the sporting world has its regular times and places. The turfite makes his rendezvous at Newmarket: the hunter at Melton: and thus proceeding through all the divisions of life, we find that Steeple Chasing has at length chosen a "special habitation." This is in a pleasant place—fight Leamington. There now par excellence may be seenthe "moving accidents by flood and field" incident to the Steeple Chase. To one of the most memorable of those of recent occurrence our Illustration has reference. We only so far identify the occasion as to state that it happened at the late Meeting. We wish the gallant fallen better luck another time.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our own Correspondent.)

There is no change in the position of the Money Market. The trifling demand last week, to meet the commercial engagements of the 4th of February, having subsided, money is, consequently, still rejected by the discount houses, the absence of demand on the part of trade and commerce creating an almost insurmountable difficulty to its safe employment.

Messrs. John Kingston and Co., a firm of long standing, and hitherto high respected, announced their suspension on Tuesday. In their circular they [illegible] the West Indian guests in, they have considered it useless to st[illegible] with bonds. At the same time, a confident hope is expressed that all [illegible] will be ultimately liquidated in full.

From Carlisle (Baden) it appears that the Legislative Chambers had [illegible] interest for fifteen years to the creditors of the three industrial establishments [illegible]

The Bankruptcies, lately conducted as share associations by Messrs Von Huber and Co., the failure of which was announced in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS This circumstance of the Chambers does not apply to the creditors of Von Huber and Co., upon their separate estate as merchants and bankers.

Mr Sanderson, the eminent bill broker, has resumed business in con mein with Messrs Hugh F. Sandeman and J Pitman, under the firm of Sanderson, Sandeman, and Company.

Consols on Monday presented little variety, alternating between buyers and sellers, at 89¼ for Account, the tendency, however, being towards a decline, at which, to the extent of about ¼, prices opened on the following d The next stood at 88¾ nearly the whole of Tuesday, but, towards the close of business, a rally to 89¼ was made. On Wednesday, Consols opened at 89 to ¼ for Money, and 89 to ¼ for Account, with no changing during the day. The same remark applies to Thursday's Market, although great absence of business marked the day's proceeding Exchequer Bills are not quite so buoyant as last week, and continue to mark a difference of about six shillings between the March and June bills. Bank Stock is firm; and New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, as well as Reduced, are at their full value The last prices are—for Bank Stock, 190; Reduced, 89¾; Consols, 89¼; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent Annuities, 99¼; Long Annuities, 9; India Stock, 265; Consols for Account, 89¼; Exchequer Bills £ 000, March, 23 pm; Ditto, £1000, ne, 25 pm; Ditto, £500, June, 28 pm; Ditto, Small, June, 25 pm

The only feature of interest in the Foreign Market is the fall in Peruvian Stock. At one period a decline of 3 per cent was established, but a slight improvement has since occurred. The cause originates in the receipt of copies of correspondence which, has passed at Lima between the Peruvian Government [illegible] Messrs. Maclean and Co., the agents of the Peruvian Bondholders. [illegible] that they had been led to suppose from a note he had just written to the Secretary of the Chilian Legation, that it was now the intention of the Peruvian Government to transfer the negotiati to London, and that it was doubtful if the Government were willing to concede to the bondholders an arrangement on the basis of that which had been made with the creditors of Chili, or the other South American States, and especially in the instance of New Granada. With these views, Messrs. Maclean and Co. pointed out that they were appointed to conduct the negotiations at Lima, in compliance with the notarized statement of the Peruvian Government that such a step was necessary to avoid delay, and that the intimation to the Government that the bearer of the Chilian arrangement would be acceptable was given because they (Messrs. Mac[illegible] and Company) had reason to believe the acceptance of the creditors would not be extended any further. Messrs. Maclean and Company then pointed out in [illegible] the present resources of Peru with those which were possessed by New Granada, and referred to its guano as being sufficient to afford ample means to fulfil its [illegible] ments, particularly as the Peruvian Government drew the belief of their ability to contract a fresh loan if required. It is, however, evidently an attempt to obtain in case fresh delay by again [illegible] the negotiations in London, and Messrs. Maclean and Co. add, that in the event of the present correspondence being broken off, they would withdraw the consent of the bondholders to accept of the Chilian terms, and would fall back upon the [illegible] original rights. To this communication the Finance Minister replies on the 1st [illegible]

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Consols Market was quiet yesterday, scarcely varying during the day. Prices at closing were 89; to ¼ for Money and the February Account. Business continued heavy, and in the Foreign Market what little business was done did not materially influence prices. Spanish Passives quoted 4¼, and Peruvian were not dealt in.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat for our market during the past week, coastwise, have been small, viz., 34 Quarters. By land carriage, the receipts have been trifling, from the want of samples for sale on the spot, but the demand for a fair description was to a very sluggish state and Monday's quotations were with difficulty supported. The best qualities could not be sold at 70s per quarter, and it was said that some fine parcels might have been purchased on somewhat lower terms. Since Monday's report there was but very little sold by sample in bond, and although the prices were almost nominal the next fair mait was held at previous quotations. Other kinds were very lower. Oats, beans, peas, and Indian corn were a mere drug In flour very little was doing.

DEMONSTRATION IN FAVOUR OF THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

THE PROCESSION PASSING LONDON-BRIDGE.

ceipt of your letter of this day's date, which has just been delivered, and I am n reply to enclose to you for your information the copy of a letter which has been addressed this morning by Sir G. Grey's directions to Commander Smith.

"I am to add that Sir G. Grey will probably be engaged in the discharge of his public duty in the House of Commons at the time mentioned in your letter, but that if from that cause he should not be in his office, the memorial, if brought in the manner suggested by him in his letter to Commander Smith, may be left at the office, or be placed in the hands of the Under Secretary of State.

"I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, DENIS LE MARCHANT."

Mr Wawn, M.P. for South Shields, was in attendance to introduce to Sir G. Grey the deputation, which consisted of Mr. Mather, a delegate from the Tyne; Captain Butchost, of the port of London, Captain T. Eliot, of Limerick; Captain Wright, of South Shields; Mr. Edgar, of London; Captain R. Smith; and Mr. J. Dunn, of Sunderland, Secretary to the Committee.

Mr. Mather (addressing the Home Secretary) said he had the honour to place in Sir G. Grey's hands the memorial of the seamen of the various ports in Great Britain against the proposed repeal of the Navigation Laws; and he begged that the right hon. Baronet would, in presenting it to the Queen, impress it upon her Majesty, that the memorial expressed the true sentiments of the British seamen. They did not wish to leave the service of the mercantile marine of their country; but he was bound to state his belief that if the proposed changes in the Navigation Laws were made, they would leave the British flag, and enter into the service of another country.

Sir G. Grey said he was himself the son of an old navy officer, and he should be sorry to see the result anticipated by Mr. Mather.

Mr. Mather: I am sure, Sir George, that if your gallant father had been alive, he would not advise the measure which it is believed her Majesty's Government have in contemplation. If their country forsake our sailors, I am afraid they will forsake their flag.

The memorial was then placed in the hands of the right hon. Baronet. It as follows:—

"THE LOYAL AND HUMBLE MEMORIAL OF THE MASTERS, MATES, AND SEAMEN, NOW ASSEMBLED IN LONDON, AND THE DELEGATES REPRESENTING THE OUTPORTS OF THE KINGDOM.

"May it please your Majesty, -We, your Majesty's oyal and dutiful subjects, beg most respectfully to approach your Majesty to lay this humble memorial as the foot of the throne, believeing that the subject-matter of it involves not only the well-being of your memorialists, but the security of your Majesty's dominions in every part of the world.

"Your Majesty's memorialists have learned with deep regret and indignation that it is seriously contemplated to repeal the Navigation Laws, the principle of which, for the protection and encouragement of British ships and British seamen, has been the undeviating policy of this maritime state for nearly 500 years.

"Your memorialists most respectfully and loyally, but firmly, as ardent friends of their country, which they sincerely love, beg to represent to your Majesty that the repeal of the Navigation Laws will bring ruin on your memorialists and the commercial marine of Britain.

"That by such a measure, admitting the cheap oreign ships, half-paid and ill-fed foreign seamen, of which your memorialists have the most correct personal knowledge, it will reduce, by a competition the lowest in the world, the condition of your memorialists and their families, and strike a fatal blow at their very existence

"That thus your memorialists will be driven to seek employment in another state, speaking the same language and possessing similar laws, where seamen's interests and seamen's rights are carefully attended to, and where thousands of British seamen have already found protection; so weakening your Majesty's empire, and giving additional strength to an already great maritime competitor.

"Your memorialists therefore urgently pray your Majesty to throw your Royal protection around your memorialists and the commercial marine of Great Britain, whose predecessors in all ages, in time of war and danger, your ancestors and this kingdom have ever found their best protection and their greatest glory

"God bless your Majesty, and counsel you in wisdom. Your petitioners will ever pray.

"Signed in the name and on behalf of the masters, mates, seamen, and shipwrights, of Britain, by their Delegates, assembled in London, this 1st day of February, 1848."

Sir G. Grey said, he would take care to lay the memorial before her Majesty, and the Deputation retired.

In point of numbers the demonstration of Wednesday must be regarded as, to a considerable extent, a failure. Instead of 20,000 seamen, the entire number of those who took part in the proceedings could scarcely have exceeded 3000. When the procession passed under London-bridge it consisted of three of the Watermen steamers, with 1000 or 1200 masters, mates, and others on board, towing ninety-two boats, in which were about 550 seamen. There were also nearly one hundred boats, rowed and manned by 500 or 600 men. One of the managers of the day's arrangements estimated the number of seamen who were in attendance throughout the day at from 5000 to 6000: but, if so, half of them certainly kept below bridge. A gentleman who was favourably placed for viewing the procession on its passing from Trafalgar-square to the Home-Office, and who took great pains to calculate the numbers of those who joined in it, estimated them at about 1200 or 1300 persons, but many seamen were walking on the pavement among the crowd, and some had already gone into the taverns and coffee-houses for refreshment. It is probable that on the whole, about 3,000 seamen came up the river on this visit to Whitehall; and they certainly deserve the greatest praise for the exceedingly orderly and peaceable demeanour which they exhibited. Several parties of the Thames Police were on duty on the river in coats; and a large detachment of the Metropolitan Police were stationed in the line of procession, but no breach of the peace took place, so far as we could learn.

NATIONAL WORKS.

There is no doubt a great amount of practical talent in the English character; our business ability is, questionless, first-rate; we have that reputation among foreigners, accept it complacently enough as a truth, and repeat it ourselves whenever there is an opportunity of self-laudation. We consider ourselves as a perpetual living rebuke to the deficiencies of our neighbours, and walk the earth with an air of superiority that says more plainly than words, "look at us you volatile, unreflecting Frenchmen, and you, dreamy Germans, who live in an atmosphere of smoke and metaphysics, more bewildered than the Egyptians in their fog; look at us all of you, and learn how plain, common-sense, practical men like John Bull, manage their affairs! We "stand no nonsense," as Oliver Cromwell used to say, according to Mr. Carlyle; a man of business, sir, is J. B.; shrewd, calculating, and far-sighted is J. B., sir!" And the whole nation makes, as it were, a collective wink, intimating how excessively clever it is, and how hopeless would be any attempt to impose upon it, or get hold of its cash without value received.

But there is a maxim, uttered too by a mere Frenchman, which very accurately applies to individuals and nations in this state of extreme self-satisfaction. And we feel bound, sometimes, to tap J. B. (John Bull, not Josh. Bagstock) on the shoulder, and whisper to him this:—"The man who thinks himself wise, is never so wise as he thinks."

If, in the first shock of surprise, he asked for proofs, we should scarcely know where to begin, they are so abundant. Whether we met him in his legislation, his administrative policies, or even the conduct of his own private business, we could show him that his practical business-like ability has often strangely slumbered, and his shrewdness been sorely at fault. We will take some instances from all three of those departments, in the order in which they are named. First, we have legislated against the Slave Trade, till we have doubled it in extent, and centupled it in horror,—a result that ought to be rather startling to practical men, who generally expect the end to correspond with the intention of those who put the means in action. In administrative matters, our ability is so marked, that, not long since, half a million of money evaporated from the Treasury in the shape of Exchequer Bills, by the management of a department thought to be perfect in all kinds of checks and "comptrollers." At this moment we are building ships and steamers in our dock-yards on a system that makes it a matter of chance whether they will either steam or sail, or do anything they are intended to do. Descending to individual affairs, we should like to hear the name of the community so easily gulled and swindled by such things as Foreign Loans, and Foreign Mines, as the practical English? Whichever way we look we find miscalculation and mismanagement. Legislation misses its object; Administration fails in the most ordinary processes; and, individually, there is a readiness to pour hard-earned wealth into the pockets of any foreign adventurers who can get up a good prospectus, and hire a door-panel to put a brass plate on, that is absolutely astounding. It is among the practical English that we find the greatest holders of such property as Mexican Mine Shares and Spanish Bonds—not among the French and Germans. Nothing but our excessive energy, and our perseverance in toil that would grind any other people down into despair, keep us in our position. In this respect, we are very justly a marvel to the world.

These few reflections have been suggested by something with which they do not at the first glance seem very closely allied, namely, the late debate on the progress of the new Houses of Parliament. But in this matter, too, there has been a grievous want of good management from the very outset, which furnishes another proof of what we assert, that the practical business-like talents we certainly do possess, are never brought to bear on undertakings that lie the least out of the common beaten track of affairs. So far from joining in the censure that we see there is a disposition in some quarters to cast on Mr. Barry, it is evident that he has been the only directing mind in the whole business, even in matters not in his own department. He is the only fixed point or centre that can be perceived; all the rest exhibits a conflict of boards, committees, and departments, working across each other to the creation of boundless confusion.

There were some methods or processes in the mechanical department of architecture, which the men of former ages knew and used, but to us are entirely lost. We still gaze on the results of their skill and knowledge with wonder, as if they were the work of a different or superior race. We are inclined to think another branch of constructive art has equally degenerated; it may be called the administrative or managing department. Just as an army in the field, that has to move according to the rules of strategy, tactics, and military science, must have a civil administration attached to it, to conduct the ordinary affairs of life, such as the supplies and clothing, so all great national works must have a certain department devoted to that general management that lies quite out of the path of Science and the Arts, constructive or decorative.

It is this sort of control that seems to have been exceedingly wanted in the works of the New Houses of Parliament, the greatest national work of the kind undertaken since the Fire of London. Would it not be possible to gather by research and enquiry some notion of how the "administration," so to speak, of the great architectural achievements of past times was conducted? Edifices, vast and beautiful, have been constructed in times comparatively recent, and it would be a labour of delight to some lovers of the past, to disinter, from documents and MS., the accounts, and forms, and as much as can be ascertained of the method of procedure on the part of the paymasters and employers of artistic skill, since method there must have been. In what shape did that power work, which is with us shared by half-a-dozen bodies, without concert, one with arrangements already made? We have an idea that the Vatican, and Versailles, and St. Peter's, and St. Mark's, and the Palaces of Venice, Florence, and Rome—to which we have nothing that deserves to be named, except our glorious old Cathedrals—were not built in this scrambling fashion. There was a head and guidance somewhere; certainly none of the Princes and Powers of those ages had the invariable resource of British legislators in a puzzle—a Parliamentary Committee, which is to all our public business what the "one sauce" ridiculed by Voltaire is to our cookery. When we have a public edifice to construct, we begin by submitting it to the incapacity of a committee of taste, whose collective ignorance generally approves the most hideous design of the competition. If, by great luck, a really good design is selected, it has in its execution to run the gauntlet of other committees who sit like a jury on different parts of the body, with perhaps a supplementary committee or two to decide on the warming and ventilation! We repeat, instead of feeling disappointed with the new House of Parliament, we are astonished to find it has emerged from all the confusions as fine a building as it is.

We give a slight gleaning from the debate of Monday night, to show how blunders caused by the almost total want of [illegible] cely credible that, in the first estimate, nothing was set down for [illegible] aking the foundation, which, as it is a river embankment, and on a loose so[illegible] has proved a serious item. Another essential point, that ought to have been fixed at the very outset, is the mode in which the architect should be paid: that has not been done up to this moment! A sum of £255,000 has been mentioned as the whole amount Mr. Barry is entitled to; but, a Treasury minute of 1839, which fixes this sum, adds: "It is but right to state that this has never been acceded to by Mr. Barry." The professional remuneration of architects is five per cent. on the outlay—not the best mode of valuation, perhaps, but that is not the question. The sum proposed to Mr. Barry, and not accepted, is not equal to what he would have received from any private employer; he has given nearly all his time to the works for fourteen years; his remuneration, therefore, has been about equal to the pay of an under secretary of a Government department, whose duties are mere routine, and which nine out of any ten men you meet in decent society are as well qualified to discharge as the holder, appointed by party interest. Equality with the lowest office in a Government like this, is the estimate we make of the talents of the man to whom is entrusted a work that all the race of Secretaries, from the time of Queen Anne, were all their abilities centred in one official marvel, could not imagine, nor wise, nor execute! It is impossible that the Government of a [illegible]eat nation will condescend to accept the services of Mr. Barry at less than their fair value; a future recompense will doubtless be made; but this is the bungling unsatisfactory mode of management of which we complain.

As we go on blunders accumulate, of which the fact that Lord Duncannon signed a plan which he thought the original one, when it was the first plan with additions, is but a specimen. No one knows who has the controlling power of the works; the Woods and Forests disclaim it; they do nothing but audit accounts; the Treasury only asks to vote the money; it is quite above directing how it is to be spent; for that there is a Committee; but the Committee resolves itself into several Committees, backed by a Commission, to decide on Statues and Frescoes. Whatever body you pitch upon, you are driven off to another; and, between all of them, the result is confusion and a mess. We have omitted one of the greatest causes or sources of delay,—the ventilation. In this matter Dr. Reid seems to have held a divided empire with Mr. Barry: Æolus was made equal to Jupiter, and their quarrels suspended a great national work for about a year! Nor was there any authority that could compel [illegible]ord and specific performance of contracts. When asked the Government always "hoped the unfortunate differences would be speedily arranged." For that can be gathered from the debate of Monday night let Lord Morpeth hoping still. It might be so—[illegible] all the powers that preside over the rising edifice, that there were palaces built, with large halls in them, in which men have met in great numbers, long before the advent of Dr. Reid. Has the supply of the human lungs with air, become a mystery within the last ten years? We wonder how the Roman Senate breathed! Dr. in later times, the 17th Convention, whose debates were of the hottest? We see every now and then the death of a member of that body at the advanced age of ninety or so; the atmosphere could not have been very unhealthy. The present French Chambers must talk within us pumped on by a French philosopher. Really it is time for all this trifling to be put an end to: either do what is to be done, or do—without it. We have the other day put quite at rest the question the estimate has been doubled, but to a nation that in two years can spend two millions on the Court of Portugal, money is an object of no importance.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

[illegible]ment is of the impression of our Journal announced the death of the venerable Primate, at Lambeth Palace, at a quarter past two o'clock, on Friday morning, the 11th inst. His [illegible]ve entered upon his 84th year, had served until Saturday [illegible]Archbishop Howley was born in 1765, at the village of Alresford, six miles from Winchester [illegible] was the Rev. Dr. William Howley, vicar of Bishop's Sutton, near Alresford, in the county of Southampton. He was the only son, and, while yet young, quitted the paternal roof for Winchester School, under the government of Dr. Joseph Warton, he laid the basis of those attainments in literature, morals, and theology, which enabled him to reach the highest position in our national church.

Having completed his studies at Winchester, Mr. Howley proceeded, in 1783, to New College, Oxford; and after residing for two years as a scholar on the Wykeham foundation, he was elected to a Fellowship. He took his degree of Master of Arts in 1787, and that of Master of Arts in 1791. Within three years from that date he was chosen a Fellow of Winchester College; and in 1804, appointed a Canon of Christ Church. In the course of the next year, he took the degree of B.D., and subsequently of D.D. and, in 1809, on the advancement of Dr. Hall to the deanery of Christ Church, Dr. Howley succeeded him as Regius Professor of Divinity.

The manner in which he discharged his duties as principal tutor of Newcastle, the fame of his learning, the purity of his life, and the acknowledged [illegible]ty of his character, obtained for him the cordial patronage of George III. It is, of course, no recollected that the Prince of Orange, now King of Holland, was at Oxford when [illegible] It is equally well known that at a very early age he was proposed as a matrimonial alliance between that illustrious personage and the Princess Charlotte, so that his Royal Highness was regarded as likely to be, one day, in this country the guardian of Prince Charlotte. The care of his sons a trust was given to Dr. Howley—a trust of no ordinary importance, and one which evidently augured his advancement to the episcopal bench. That the learned Professor of Divinity stood high in the estimation of his Royal pupil, there can be no doubt, it is well known that the last time the king of Holland was in this country he paid a visit at Lambeth Palace, and took especial pains to mark in a high degree with which, after the lapse of many years, he continued to [illegible] preceptor Dr. Howley was also tutor to the Marquis of [illegible]

Dr. Howley's discharge of the duties of the Professorship added so considerably to his reputation, that on the death of the Bishop of London, in 1813, Dr. Howley was elevated to the See of London, this being the first instance [illegible] elevated over any other than a course [illegible] thus elevated and responsible situation, discharged its duties with the same spirit of candour, and firmness of principle, so as to [illegible] was consecrated Lambeth Palace, and [illegible]30 III., though upwards of 70 years of age [illegible] enemy, accepted by both of the Princesses. In the following [illegible]r, our new Bishop made his primary visitation; and the Charge which his Lordship delivered on that occasion, being published, produced considerable excitement in one or two quarters, especially amongst the Unitarians, who described as "loving to question rather than learn." Their opinion Mr. Belsham, attacked the diocesan of London in a [illegible] was in vain: he ceased him of enforcing the slavish doctrine of passive [illegible] ruler than the free and inquiring spirit of Protestantism. [illegible] reply, certainly succeeded in proving that one of the [illegible]s of a Christian is to "approach the oracles of Divine truth, with that humble docility, that prostration of the understanding and the will," which [illegible] great Reformers of every age and almost of every Christian Church have already inculcated.

For fifteen years, Bishop Howley administered the affairs of the See of London [illegible] with prudence, and prosperity. Within that [illegible] the agitation of Parliamentary Reform, and the advocates for Roman Catholic Relief [illegible] immunity, and even restored with unwonted [illegible] [illegible] has character to leave behind him any very [illegible]

Residing in the vicinity of the Court since 1813, a man of his character necessarily acquired considerable influence with the Royal Family. Many members of that illustrious house sought from him counsel and consolation in their dying moments, as is well known to the public. Nor were the offices which he administered to the Sovereign, and the immediate relatives of the Monarch, confined to death-bed scenes: he assisted at all those marriages of the Royal Family which followed close upon the death of the Princess Charlotte, the baptisms of the several issue of those unions, the funeral of George III., and the coronation as well as the funeral of George IV.

In 1828, on the death of Archbishop Sutton, Dr. Howley was elevated to the See of Canterbury: this good fortune was attributed by the Archbishop's political opponents to the agency which he gave to the Bill of Pains and Penalties against Queen Caroline. Bishop Howley, on that occasion, laid [illegible] with [illegible] opinion that the King could do no wrong either morally or politically.

Nevertheless, the year of his elevation, and the months of his elevation, protested against the policy of the Minister from whom he had received his appointment; and when the principle of the great Government measure of that year (the Roman Catholic Relief Bill of 1829) came under discussion in the House of Lords, and after the Duke of Wellington had concluded his speech, moving the second reading of the Bill, the Archbishop rose, and in a calm, loud, and learned address, moved an amendment, "That the bill should be [illegible] that day six months," "dreading," he observed, "the designs of the Papists more than the consequences which might result from a refusal of their claims." His Grace also opposed the Reform Bill on the second reading, in October, 1831, and justified his vote in favour of the late Lord Wharncliffe's motion, on the ground that he thought the bill would "be unnecessary, in its tendency and dangerous to the fabric of the Constitution." Earl Grey was defeated by a majority of 41, but in the following spring his Grace effected no further opposition on that question. We may mention as the last important part he took in the House of Lords, his energetic opposition to the Government education measure introduced by Viscount Melbourne in 1839, which he was instrumental in defeating by an overwhelming majority.

In the Memoir in the Times, it is remarked that Archbishop Howley "had other difficulties with which to contend, and other painful duties to perform. He had baptized the Queen, and had solemnized her marriage: he had placed the Crown upon her head; he was the first ecclesiastic in the realm; and when it appeared to him, as well as to other distinguished members of the hierarchy, that in the palace of the Sovereign, Sunday was observed in a manner rather in accordance with the gaiety of continental tastes than with the quiet reserve of English and Protestant habits, he did not hesitate to call her Majesty's attention to the subject; and it has been stated that more than once during the Melbourne Ministry he respectfully tendered to the Crown advice not quite in accordance with the wishes of those who at that time possessed the most influential and unrestricted access to the Throne. Though a man of remarkably mild and unassuming manners, he was by no means deficient in moral courage, nor likely to be deterred by any set of courtiers from discharging a duty due to his Sovereign, or to the Church of which that Sovereign is the head."

Upon the accession of Dr. Howley to the Archbishopric, he found the Palace, at Lambeth, in a very dilapidated condition. He almost immediately set about its re-edification and restoration. He commenced, also, extensive repairs in the Cathedral at Canterbury. At Lambeth, his grace expended, in this munificent spirit, upwards of £30,000. As we previously observed in a manner rather the improvements at Lambeth, we shall leave their details for that opportunity. Upon his seat, at Addington, near Croydon, the Archbishop also expended considerable sums: this was his favourite retreat.

Christian courtesy, especially to strangers, was at all times a prominent and a very lovely feature in Dr. Howley's character. Those, more than twenty years since, an American traveler, Mr. Wheaton, visiting Bath a little before London, thus describes his reception

"I proceeded to the house of the Bishop of London, in St. James's-square. He [illegible] preparing to ride out, and his carriage was waiting at the door; but he was kind enough to detain me for half an hour, putting a variety of questions relative to literary and ecclesiastical matters in the United States. The conversation was long, and to me highly interesting, and impressed me with sentiments of increased respect for this amiable and excellent prelate

So, also, Dr. Tyng, of Philadelphia, visiting Dr. Howley at Lambeth, fifteen years after, finds him still the same man. He says—

"The Archbishop crossed the room to meet me, and shaking hands with me in a very cordial manner, handed me a chair with so much politeness and kindness of manner as at once to put me at my ease, and made me feel entirely at home with him. The distinctive traits of his manner and appearance are meekness and unaffectedness. He is so perfectly unassuming, and courteous without [illegible] affability and freedom, that I was unconsciously detained in a conversation which I might have reasonably feared would have been an intrusion in a perfect stranger." "I was surprised, considering his age, station, and occupations, at the knowledge he had of many minute and subordinate manners among us." "There was a remarkable moderation of sentiment in all his conversation, and nothing which appeared in any degree of bigotry, or illiberality of the strange doctrines which the men of Oxford have brought into the church"

Archbishop Howley, though not a man of brilliant talents, has left many charges and sermons, accustomed to be perfectly orthodox, and written with spirit and not without elegance. Yet he was by no means eloquent in the pulpit, nor in addressing a public assembly. Extreme moderation was the distinguishing feature of his character, and his reluctance [illegible] the venerable Primate was an active promoter of good and liberal works [illegible] by the following list of the offices which he filled. His Grace was a Lord of Trade and Plantations, Commissioner for Ecclesiastical Causes, Visitor for the British Museum, and a Governor of the Charter House. He was Visitor of All Souls, Balliol, and Merton Colleges, Oxford, and of King's College, London; [illegible]ors School, Dulwich College, and of Archbishop Tenison's Grammar School. [illegible] was a munificent benefactor to the various religious and charitable institutions of the metropolis, and was President of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, of the Anniversary Festival of the Society for Building Churches; of the National Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church; of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; of the Clergyman's Orphan School; of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews; of the Grey Coat Hospital School at Westminster, of the School for the Indigent Blind; the St. Anne's Society, Soho, &c.

His Grace was a Fellow of the Royal Society; a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries; and a member of the Royal Society of Literature; and a Privy Councillor since 1813.

Before he became Bishop of London, Dr. Howley married Mary Frances, eldest daughter of John Bell, Esq., of Southampton. The issue of that marriage were two sons and three daughters. One of the Archbishop's sons was for a short time an officer in the Guards, but he died of consumption at the age of twenty. His other son only lived to be twelve years of age. The Archbishop's eldest daughter married, in the year 1826, Sir George Shadwell Bennett, Bart., and died in ten years after her marriage. Another of his daughters was married to a Mr Wright, and a third to a Mr Kingsmill.

The latter years of the deceased Prelate were not much distinguished from the general quietude of his life. Even within a year of his decease he appeared in public almost as frequently as usual, though, of course, he gradually ceased to preach, and very rarely took part in the debates in the Upper House of Lords. At length, the infirmities attendant upon extreme old age became every day more apparent; a severe attack of the pre-ailing epidemic shattered his enfeebled constitution; it was followed by a relapse, and, in a very short time, he sank into irremediable debility: his end was tranquil, and within a short period of his decease, he was in full possession of his faculties

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

Sir Alexander Charles Gibson Maitland, Bart, of Clifton Hall, Mid Lothian, was the son of the first Baronet, the Hon Thomas Alexander Maitland, by Lucy, daughter of the Hons of Lauderdale. He was born the 21st Nov. 1775, and married Helen, daughter and heiress of Alexander Gibson Wright, Esq., of the Glissons of Dare, in Pitcairne, and cousin to the present Sir Thomas [illegible] been Carmichael, Bart. Sir Alexander Maitland succeeded his father as second Baronet, on the 14th of February, 1820, his death occurred at Edinburgh on the 7th inst., at the advanced age of ninety-two. He left issue by the said Helen Gibson of Dare, of whom three sons and five daughters survive. The Baronet just deceased had two brothers, one of whom, William, was drowned in the Bay of Bengal, while a Midshipman on board the other Augustus, an officer of rank in the army, was mortally wounded at Quatre Op Zee, in 1797.

LIEUT.-GEN SIR THOMAS REYNELL.

Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Reynell, Bart and K.C.B., was the third son of Thomas Reynell, Esq., who fell at the battle of Saratoga in 1777, and whose direct ancestor, Richard Reynell, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, was created a [illegible]onnet in 1678. Sir Thomas Reynell entered the British service, as an Ensign, in 1793, and rose through all the grades of rank to that of Lieutenant-General, being appointed in 1837. He was also made a Knight Commander of the Bath, and of the Russian Imperial Sword of St. George Order; he was Colonel of the 71st Regiment, and he succeeded to the Baronetcy on the decease of his brother in 1839.

Sir Thomas passed nearly fifty-five years in the army—a period of brilliant distinction to himself, and of valuable service to his country. During the late war he was always actively engaged: he was in the West Indies, in Holland, in Egypt, in India, in the Peninsula, and at Waterloo. In addition to the Commandership of the Bath, he was decorated with the insignia of a Knight of the Austrian Order of Maria Teresa, and of the 4th Class of the Order of St. George, through the recommendation of the Duke of Wellington, immediately after the battle of Waterloo, when Sir Thomas was so unlucky, in command of the 71st Highland Light Infantry.

Sir Thomas Reynell married, the 12th February, 1831, the Lady Elizabeth Pack, daughter of George, first Marquis of Waterford, and widow of Major-General Sir Denis Pack, K.C.B. Sir Thomas died at his seat, near Arundel, on the 10th inst.; and, as he leaves no issue nor male relation, the Baronetcy, one distinguished from its creation by lawyers, statesmen, and warriors, becomes extinct

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The discussion on the Address in the French Chamber of Deputies was brought to a close on Saturday. M. Guizot having again declared that he would make no concession, the Chamber divided on the last amendment which had been proposed, according to second advices from Paris, and made there were 199 for the amendment and 222 against it, giving to the Ministers a majority of 23. The ensemble of the Address being next put, the Opposition, in a body, abstained from voting, and thus, of 344 present, 322 who voted, there were 241 for the Ministry. The other three votes were probably those of some Legitimists who did not concur in the course adopted by the Opposition; or they may have been given by some Conservatives, to give the appearance of a parliamentary division

The threatening aspect which the political horizon had begun to assume at the close of last week in the French capital continues to be more and more menacing. According to second advices from Paris, all minds there were preoccupied with the possible consequences of the situation into which political parties, as well in the Chamber as out of it, have been thrown by the proceedings of last week in the Representative Chamber

The Ministry, shaken by the manifestations with in the Chamber, and alarmed by the fermentation throughout the capital, had resolved, at the eleventh hour, to yield to the pressure, and to give way on the question of the banquet. Several a speech, which his organ of the press, the Journal des Débats, in two leading articles on Sunday and Monday, has interpreted as a distinct pledge that the Conservative will bring before the present Chamber, at a convenient time, a measure of parliamentary reform. This the Débats affirms to be the clear intent and meaning of the speech of the Minister, who is compelled to observe the reserve in his words which official responsibility of office imposes upon him. Neither the nature nor extent of the reform can be stated, because the Chamber itself must decide these, and not the Cabinet; but they will be such as the majority of the Chamber can be brought to consent to. In short, it is understood that the question will be brought forward by the Government in the session of 1849

Meantime another question has arisen out of the incidents of the debate. The menaces of the Government have assailed the right of public meeting, an imprescriptible public right of the people of all constitutional states. The opposition, putting aside for the moment the reform question, have determined boldly to oppose this pretension of the Cabinet, which they pronounced to be monstrous. They have, therefore, determined at once to brave the threat, and to hold in the very heart of the capital one of those meetings, which the Government has denounced, but to accompany it with every constitutional precaution which can tend to throw the Government in the wrong, and cover with odium any attempt to suppress it. A committee of twelve Deputies has been appointed to concert with the Central Reform Committee of the Seine, as to the management of the projected reform banquet of the 19th accordingly. With the further view to the peaceable object, a meeting of above a hundred deputies of the opposition was held in the Place de la Madeleine on Sunday, at which a public manifesto was agreed on, stating that "they have recognised that the address, such as it has been voted, constitutes a part of the majority, a flagrant and audacious violation of the rights of the minority: and that the Ministers have, by drawing their party into so exhibitant an act, at once infringed one of the most sacred principles of the constitution, violated in the person of their representatives one of the essential rights of the citizens, and, by a measure of Ministerial safety, thrown over the country the most pernicious seeds of division and disorder

"In such circumstances, they have found that their duties acquired a graver, a more imperious character, and that in the midst of those events which now agitate Europe, and threateningly France, they could no longer abandon for a single instant the guardianship and the defence of the interests of the nation. The opposition will remain steady at its post, in order to watch and combat incessantly the counter-revolutionary policy, the audacity of which now excites the anxiety of the whole country.

"As to the right of meeting of the citizens, a right which the Ministers seem willing to contribute to their own profit, and confiscate to their profit, the meeting, unanimously convinced that this right, inherent in every free constitution, is, moreover, formally established by our laws, have determined upon repelling by every legal and constitutional means of maintaining it intact, and of consecrating it."

The resolution to hold the Reform banquet in Paris, in the teeth of the Ministerial prohibition, was adopted, without a single dissentient voice, by the deputies present, amounting to above one hundred

It is said that each of the Mayors of the arrondissements of Paris as belong to the Opposition party have signified to the Government their resignation of their functions if the Government should attempt any resistance to the intended banquet of the 14th arrondissement

A report prevails that M. Rambuteau, Prefect of the Seine, as well as M. Desseret, the Prefect of Police, has resigned

La Semaine says: "The men here of the Chamber of Peers to whom invitations have been sent to attend the banquet of the twelfth arrondissement, are six in number—the Duke d'Harcourt, the Prince de la Moskowa, M. de Boissy, M. Laujuinais, M. d'Alton Shée, and another, whom we refrain from naming at present, because, if we are well informed, he has not announced that he accepts the invitation."

A commission, nominated by the Minister of the Marine for inspecting the transatlantic steamers, ceded by the Government to the company of Hermann and Handel, with a view to ascertain the present condition of these ships, and lay down the basis of a re-organisation of this service, has commenced its operations by visiting le Havre the Philadelphia and New York, and thence is gone to Cherbourg to examine the Union

The usual receptions at the Chateau have been quite re-established, and the King appears to enjoy his former health. He drives out each afternoon to Neuilly, or some of the other Royal pleasure grounds near Paris, where he walks.

Amongst the many statements in the journals which the state of affairs has called forth, we observe that the Council of Ministers having experienced much anxiety in consequence of "the situation," General Jacqueminot had called together the Colonels of the National Guard of Paris, and questioned them as to the spirit which prevailed in their respective legions, and that he had received answers not calculated to reassure a Cabinet which contemplated means of armed repression. It is also said that General Sebastiani had taken similar steps in relation to the superior officers of the garrison of the capital, whose answers brought no other assurance than that the Line would support the National Guard, but that any independent action, in case of a popular movement could not be relied on

The Government has caused to be deposited in the barracks, and especially in those of the 14th arrondissement, munitions and rations for eight days, and also axes and other implements, as if for an approaching action

The National Guard is busier than ever in preparing a demonstration in support of the Reform movement. The commanders have exercised their officers, in order to ascertain their opinions; and addresses are in preparation to be presented to the Opposition, urging firmness, legality, and resistance. The Municipal Council have sent a collective address to M. Rambuteau, prefect of the Seine, warning him against the danger of forcibly resisting the projected banquet, which is fixed for Sunday next (to-morrow). At a meeting of the opposition deputies, on Monday, resolutions were passed, the purport of which did not transpire, but it was asserted that no time would be lost in giving a solemn and peaceful form to a manifestation which will be the more imposing from having for its object the cause of public liberty. The address of the Chamber was presented at the Tuileries on Monday evening, the Opposition deputies being absent.

Fifteen Opposition deputies had met at the house of M. Billault, and resolved not to attend the proposed banquet, but also to decline attending at the Tuileries on the presentation of the address.

The purpose of the proposed banquet of the Liberal party, General Thiars, a distinguished member of the Opposition in the Chamber of Deputies, has placed his house (situate in the Champs Elysées) at the disposal of the party, and there the dinner will take place. Not fewer than 600 guests are expected to be present.

Letters from Marseilles say that M. Del Carreto had disembarked at the Lazaretto, previously to the quarantine being over, with the Neapolitans and Sicilians at Marseilles, many of whom were driven from their country by his pitiless orders, assembled in large numbers to witness the humiliation of the Minister of Police, but no attempt was made to offer him any indignity or insult

SPAIN

We have news from Madrid to the 30th inst. It had been resolved to send a mission to Berlin, in order to induce Prussia to recognise the succession of the wife of the Duchess de Montpensier. It was stated that another intervention on the part of spain in Portugal was probable, and a most strong declaration such a step had been presented by Mr. Bulwer. The Emperor of Morocco had protested against the occupation by spain of the Chaffarina Islands. Mr. Henderson, the agent of the bondholders, had arrived at Madrid, and had an interview with the Minister of Finance and Mr Bulwer. The result, it was stated, would be satisfactory to the bondholders. General Alaix had been recalled to Madrid.

The Herald announces that the Government had ordered a steam frigate, at Portsmouth, to proceed to Naples, to protect the persons and property of Spanish subjects. Further states that a vessel had left Barcelona de la Ross would shortly leave Madrid on his embassy to Rome, the political difficulties and considerations which had hitherto prevented him from setting out, having been brought to a conclusion

PORTUGAL

From Lisbon we have advices to the 9th inst. The daily debates in either House are now assuming a character of interest; the first matters disposed of have been the Addresses to her Majesty in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The tenor of these documents differs but in small degree from the general style in similar cases. The state of the finances is, however, admitted to be miserable, and the necessity of increased and heavy taxation is insisted upon; and this, with extraordinary economies, are stated to be the only means that present themselves by which the country can be saved. The only political matter connected with the Addresses worthy of note, is contained in the one from the Lower House, where it is declared that rigid inquiry is necessary to ascertain whether the dignity of the Crown, or her Majesty's Royal prerogative, have in any way been offended by the terms of the convention entered into, by which her Majesty granted an amnesty to her subjects lately in arms This particular paragraph has attracted notice, as seemingly indicative of a desire less to conciliate than to revert to harsh measures.

Taking advantage of the slight debate upon the Address in the Upper Chamber, Costa Cabral seized upon the occasion to enter upon his long-promised explanation and defence of his conduct, both as regards the public acts of his administration and the still more grave charges preferred against him of personal corruption. His speech commenced on the 31st, and was continued for three days.

We also learn that much sickness still prevailed in the British squadron at Lisbon. From January 2 to February 4, there had been 48 cases of small pox on board the St. Vincent, out of which twelve cases had proved fatal. From the 3rd February to the 9th inclusive, only two more slight cases had appeared, in two midshipmen on board that ship All the other cases of infection in the other ships of the squadron were rapidly on the decline when the packet left Lisbon. The influenza, too, was also very general on board the French frigate Psyche, in the Tagus.

A great sensatio had been caused in Lisbon by the rumour that a note from our Government had formally announced to the Portuguese Government that the Protocol was not yet fulfilled, as the present House of Deputies was not considered to e freely or legally elected. The Minister of the Kingdom had summoned the members of the House of Deputies to a conference. The result was not known.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples of the 3d state that at that date the most perfect tranquility prevailed. The King had fixed the 7th for the troops to take the oath of fidelity to the constitution, and the grand ceremony of taking the oath by the King, and the great powers of the State having raised the question as to the church in which it should take place, the King rejected that of the Holy Ghost, as it was there that Ferdinand the First swore fidelity to the first Constitution, which he afterwards violated. The King would not take the oath in a building where a Royal perjury had been committed. There is no truth in the report that the Austrian Ambassador had protested against the grant of a constitution. He may have stated that his Government would see the change with displeasure; but he has gone no further, and maintains the most absolute reserve, appearing to be waiting for instructions from Vienna. Up to the 29th ult., the latest from which events had taken place at Naples was received at Messina General Nunziante, who was still blockaded in the citadel, had attempted a sortie, in which he sustained heavy losses, and left his artillery in the power of the insurgents. Perceiving that the people stormed the fort of Castellazzo, which commands the town. The garrison quartered at Reggio (Calabria) was compelled to retire, and there was a general rising throughout that province. The King had granted to Sicily the Constitution of 1812, which had been accepted by the insurgents, on the condition that the Prince Royal (now 12 years old) should reside at Palermo as viceroy, a regency being established until he shall attain his majority, and a separate parliament to be established at Palermo. An amnesty was proclaimed, from which, however, were excepted the emigrants of 1821 All the fortifications of Sicily were surrendered to the insurgents, and all the troops had returned to Naples.

In Sardinia the King, anticipating an application from the municipalities of Turin and Genoa, has granted the French Constitution to his subjects. A proclamation issued by him, and published in Turin on the 8th, announces the bases. The principles on which it is founded are nearly those of the French charter. The greatest rejoicings had taken place at Turin on the 9th, on account of the granting of the new Constitution. A statue to the King had been voted by the municipality.

On the 4th the Junta of Palermo, which had hitherto acted as a Provisional Government, published a proclamation in the new journal, Il Cittadino, in which the Genera. Committee of Palermo constituted itself the Provisional Government of all Sicily, and resolved itself into Committees of War, Finance, Justice, the Interior, and Commerce and Public Instruction. The President of the Provisional Government thus formed is Admira. Ruggero Settimo

On the 6th, after an obstinate conflict, Count Pepoli, who commanded the fort of Castellamare, had consented to surrender it to the Provisional Government, and was permitted to embark with the Garrison on three steam-vessels which were in the port. By the terms of the capitulation the troops were not even allowed to retain their arms and baggage, and an exchange of prisoners was made. These were the last of the Neapolitan troops which had remained at Palermo.

Letters from Rome, of the 2nd instant, announce that the Pope intended to grant constitutional institutions to his people. His Holiness had sent for Father Ventura, who had of late settled those public affairs, to consult him on the subject

The Florence journals of the 6th concur in stating that Austria is making extraordinary efforts to oversee the Liberal party in Italy. One of these journals announces that the little army of the Duke of Modena has been formally incorporated with that of Austria, and placed under the immediate orders of General Radetzky. Another mentions a report that the Emperor of Austria has demanded from the King of Sardinia, that Alexandria shall be given up to Austria. It is known that Charles Albert has been strengthening the defences of Alexandria, as if he had anticipated something of the kind stated in the Florence journal.

Advices from Bologna, of the 4th in- stant, state that the proclamation of the Constitution at Naples had been celebrated there by a grand fete, in which the authorities themselves had joined. The people cried, "Down with the Dominicans! Long live Constitution! Death to the Austrians! Let us march to the assistance of our brethren in Lombardy."

Letters from Verona announce the arrest of Count Lmdau during the night-time, on the charge that of having transmitted to Milan the money collected at Vero a for the wounded and maimed of the 3rd ult. He has been committed to the fortress of Legnano.

The Municipal Council have presented a petition to the Viceroy of Lombardy at Milan, praying for Reform. To this the Viceroy has replied that the Emperor listens to all reasonable demands, legally presented.

It is generally understood that the Emperor Ferdinand had written to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, enjoining him as an Archduke of Austria not to grant any constitution to his subjects. Should he comply with the wishes of his people demanded, the troops of Austria, Parma, and Modena, have been ordered to enter Tuscany, and that an Austrian army would enter into and occupy the Tuscan territory, as they have entered into and occupy Parma and Modena.

SWITZERLAND.

In the sitting of the Swiss Diet, of the 9th instant, the Committee of Nine made the following propositions:—1. The claims of the late Sonderbund, which have not yet paid up their proportion of the expenses of the war, be required to do so on or before the 20th inst., at the latest. 2. That such Cantons as shall fail in making this payment within the prescribed time, in addition to the extra acts to the Federal Government, shall be occupied by the Federa. troops, whose wants in these cases, be supported and paid by such Cantons respectively; and, 3 That the Federal staff shall be dissolved.

In the sitting of the Grand Council of Basle, on the 9th instant, Deputy Schoenbein proposed to insert the following clauses in the project for the revision of the Pact:

1. That every Swiss should have the right to belong to whatever confession of faith he thought fit, and to openly fulfil the duties imposed upon him by the same in every part of the Confederation.

2 That religion was in no way to be connected with political questions.

The proposition, on being put to the vote, was carried by a majority of 92. It will, therefore, come under discussion.

The Suisse et Berne says:—"It results from the returns of the contingents furnished by the fifteen Cantons for the execution against the Sonderbund, that all these Cantons, with the exception of Basle, where the contingent was not completed by 33 men, sent much larger forces than they were bound to send. Zurich had 7586 over the contingent due, Berne 11,158, and the other Cantons in proportion Altogether they supplied 48,000 men more than they were bound to send. There were 172 pieces of artillery, and 88 on the ramparts of Geneva."

Letters from Geneva, of the 11th, report that M. James Fazy, the Minister of the Council of State, and the other members of that body, had resigned. The cause of this proceeding is reported to be the refusal of the Grand Council to entertain certain measures for the freedom of the press proposed by M. James Fazy, in consequence of his having been injuriously misrepresented in the Journal de Genève, as he thinks, by the instigation of some foreign agent. The Grand Council recommending that the ordinary vacancies should be resorted to to afford redress if the law had been transgressed by the journal in question, had passed a resolution that the members of the Council of State should be requested to withdraw their resignations. If that should not be complied with, it was expected that another Council of State would be elected.

The Russian Government has instructed its representative to inform the Diet that it fully approves of the steps presented to that body by the Governments of Prussia, Austria, and France.

PRUSSIA.

The Berlin State Gazette contains the Prussian budget for the present year, according to which the whole amount of income amounts to 64,556,479 thalers, and the expenses of Government are calculated to exactly the same amount, or about half a million more than in 1847 Copies of this document have, for the first time, been forwarded from the Board of Finance to every member of the United Diet, so that his Majesty seems anxious to comply with all reasonable claims of his subjects.

The official Gazette of Prussia publishes a Royal decree, establishing an Evangelical Consistory at Berlin, to regulate the religious affairs of the kingdom. The Minister of Public Worship is appointed President, and the college is to consist of an equal number of clergy and laymen.

GERMAN STATES.

BAVARIA.—From Munich, under date of the 10th instant, we have news of disturbances having been produced by the students of the University, who had formed themselves into two political associations, having distinctive badges. One of them, being patronized by Lola Montes, had been the cause of existing hostilities between the parties, and the result had been that the partisans of the lady in question, having been assailed violently in the streets, took refuge in a tavern. The students, thus attacked, appealed to Lola, who came out to their assistance. She was pursued, and fled to the Austrian embassy. where, however, she found the gates closed against her The King, in the meanwhile, being informed of the row, came to the assistance of Lola, and, taking her on his arm, they both passed a church. from which the mob immediately issued, pistol in hand. She was, however, disarmed by a man, who seized her by the throat. She was ultimately extricated by gendarmes, who brought her to the Palace. The garrison was put under arms, and the University ordered to be closed for a year. Riots ensued, the populace taking part with the students.

The Correspondent of the Times, writing from Munich on the 11th inst., says:—"King Louis has yielded. The Countess de Landsfeld has been ordered to depart, and the decree suspending the lectures of the University, repealed. The concession of the King probably saved his Throne, for Dr. L. Burton of the entire population, including the nobility, the Princes of the Royal Family, and even the officers of the army, against the King, on account of his scandalous conduct, has been roused to the highest pitch. During the last year the popularity of the reigned in Bavaria, and her will had become the law of the land. King Louis had become the slave of Lola Montes, who prevailed upon him to change his Ministry three times in the course of the year. The Bavarian people, however phlegmatical and patient, could not bear true yoke any longer.

"This morning, on hearing of the decree relative to the suppression of the University, upwards of 2000 of the most respectable citizens met at the Town-House, and resolved to send a deputation to the King, to demand the expulsion of Lola Montes, and the revocation of the decree. The Palace was entirely surrounded with troops and gendarmes. The King, enraged at the demand of the people, and at the refusal of the troops to attack the people assembled on the Palace-square, had sent in all haste to Augsburg for a reinforcement of Light Cavalry, which was to be forwarded by the railway. But when the deputation of the city, with the Mayor at its head, came before him—when the Ministers, the Councillors of State, and even the Princes, his sons, described to him the danger to which he exposed his Crown by his obstinacy, his Majesty at last yielded. Otherwise, we should probably have another throne vacant, and an ex-King the more in Europe. Never was so great an exultation of the people witnessed in Germany. It was believed a moment the King repented having made those concessions, for two hours afterwards he was seen to arrive at the residence of his ministers to ask for one of her; but Lola Montes was already gone, accompanied by the maledictions of all honest men. The people had broken open the doors of the house, and were actually demolishing it. The troops quietly looked on, and the King, finding his authority annihilated, returned to the palace with tears in his eyes. Considerable excitement still prevails, and cries of joy are heard in every direction. Unfortunately the affray was attended with bloodshed. Two students, the sons of high functionaries of the State, were killed, and many wounded. The officer of the gendarmes who commanded the attack had been arrested and thrown into prison."

Congress is still in full deliberation upon the measure for continuing the war with Mexico The bill asking for the ten new regiments is still in the Senate.

The Treasury would very soon need more money According to the estimates of the Secretary, 18,000,000 dollars would be needed before the 30th of June next. Accordingly, a bill has been reported in the House of Representatives, authorizing a loan to that amount, limiting the interest to six per cent. for a stock having twenty years to run, and which must not be sold under par.

The approaching Presidential election was becoming the all-absorbing topic. All parties seemed to admit that to discuss the merits of the several candidates was some months too early; and yet all were plunging into that political vortex with an ardour and a zeal that might reasonably be expected only a few weeks before the day of election.

General Scott, commanding the army in Mexico, had been suspended. A court of inquiry has been ordered for the purpose of investigating the recent difficulties in the army.

By this arrival we also learn that a treaty of peace had been concluded by the American Commissioner Mr. Trist, in conjunction with General Scott. It is said the terms are liberal, roved of by the Cabinet at Washington.

A train, under the command of Colonel Miles, had been attacked and plundered by a guerilla party. The loss of goods falls principally on the Americans, one English house losing 24,000 dollars. The French and Spanish merchants recovered their goods by paying smartly. The portion of the train out off had incontinently surrendered. Colonel Miles could not prevail upon them to come up, but left a guard of 25 men behind, which was totally inadequate against the sudden onset of 400 guerilleros.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ROYAL LONDON OPHTHALMIC HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday, the forty-third annual general meeting of the governors of the above hospital was held at the institution in Bloomfield-street, Moorfields, the Rev. J Russell, D.D., in the chair The report stated that during the past year, 199 in-patients had been admitted and 7672 out-patients had received the benefit of the charity, being a total of 7871 persons, an increase over the previous year of 662. The financial statement showed the income from all sources, including a balance last year of £347 13s., to be £794 6s. 4d.; and the expenditure left in hand £373 1s. 2d., which would, however, be swallowed up in the liquidation of outstanding liabilities. An increase sum of £280 per annum is required to maintain its present usefulness. Upwards of 150,000 persons have been received since 1805. The report was adopted, and the Committee and other officers elected, when a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, and the meeting broke up.

THE PRESBYTERIAN ORATION was on Monday delivered by Mr. R. D. Grainger, in the theatre of the College of Surgeons, Lincoln's Inn-fields, which was crowded in every part by the Fellows and members of the College, together with some distinguished visitors, including Sir R. In the evening, the President and Council of the college entertained a distinguished party at the freemasons' Tavern

THE TRUE REDEMPTION FRUST.—On Wednesday, a meeting of the members of this society was held at their office, in Ab ngdon-street, Westminster Lord Ashley in the chair, presided. There were also present, Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., the Rev. Dr. Spranger, the Rev. Messrs. J. T. Russell, Swan, Denne, Mallett, &c., Mr G. H. Drew, and other supporters of the society. The secretary stated that he had sent copies of the prospectus to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and to all the bishops, most of whom concurred in their views. He had received communications from a great number of persons, some of whom were willing to give up the tithes they held as lay impropriators for a fair consideration. Several new subscribers had been added to their list since the last meeting, and many applications had been made for advice how to act where there were disputes regarding tithes restored. He then read a letter in which suggestions which he had received for carrying out the object they supported. A discussion ensued, in which Lord Robert Grosvenor, Lord John Manners, the Rev Mr. Mallett, Mr. Drewell, and the Rev. Mr. Scott took part; after which a committee was appointed, and the meeting adjourned till a future day.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY ON SOUTHWARK BRIDGE.—On Sunday morning, between two and three o'clock, as Mr. Joseph Archer, of Kennington, in Surrey, was passing over Southwark-bridge, when near the centre he was met by two men, one of whom, without uttering a word, knocked him down by a violent blow on the head, inflicted, it is supposed, with a life preserver, rendering him insensible; whilst in this state the ruffians rifled the person of two five pound Bank of England notes and four sovereigns. On recovering, he made his way to the toll-gate, and gave the alarm, but the fellows had escaped.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &C., FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEB. 12.—The births exceed the deaths again this week; the last few weeks formed striking exceptions to this general rule. The births registered within the district included by the bills of mortality, were 1457 in number, of which 777 were males, and 680 females. Last week the total births were 1367 The deaths this week are 1324 in number, of which 674 were males, and 650 females. Last week the number was 1217. An excess over the weekly average for the last five winters is 217. The decline in mortality has fallen to 47, the weekly average for the last five winters being, however, only 3. The deaths from small-pox for this week 33—nearly double the average which during the last five winters has been 17. The deaths from bronchitis are still rather numerous—namely, 121, the average being 61. The meteorological report shows the temperature to have been 6 degrees above the average for the corresponding week during the last twenty-five years The general direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the sum of the horizontal movement at Greenwich during the week was 1746 miles. The sum of the rain was 56 inches.

GREENWICH ROYAL HOSPITAL SCHOOLS.

At the present moment, when the public mind is so largely occupied with the subject of "National Defences," the accompanying illustrations of one of the most important provisions made by the munificence of our Sovereign, Queen Victoria, will, doubtless, be acceptable to our readers. They will, also, be interesting, as showing with what regularity and precision the courses of instruction and discipline are ordered in this ancient and liberal institution, which was first undertaken and established, maintained, and educated eight hundred children, destined to man our "wooden walls," as well as to extend the blessings of civilisation in many an unexplored land.

It will be seen that the present efficient condition of these schools has been of gradual growth, and the result of large experience; more especially as we are enabled to add, from official sources, to present the reader with all the system of management in all its leading details

The Royal Hospital Schools are divided into two distinct departments, which are designated, respectively, "The Upper School" and "the Lower School."

THE UPPER SCHOOL

Is the old "Greenwich Hospital School;" and in it are clothed, boarded, and educated, 400 boys, the sons of officers and men of the Royal Navy and Marines; and of officers and seamen of the Merchant service. Of these, 100 are the sons of Commissioned and Ward room Warrant Officers of the Royal Navy and Marines, are nominated by the First Lord of the Admiralty. The remaining 300 boys, sons of officers of the above, of inferior rank, and of private Seamen in Marines, who have served, or are serving in the Royal Navy, as well as of officers and seamen in the merchant service—are nominated by the Patrons of the School, who exercise their privilege in rotation, as vacancies occur.

The Patrons are the Lords of the Admiralty, the First Secretary to the Admiralty; the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor of Greenwich Hospital; five Commissioners of the Hospital; and the Chairman of the Patriotic Fund.

The qualifications for admission to this school are, that the candidates shall have attained ten, and not have exceeded eleven years of age; be free from all bodily infirmity; be able to read fluently; to write [illegible] and to work the first four rules of arithmetic with facility and accuracy. In their fourteenth year, they are subjected to a quarterly examination by the Chaplain, the Head Master, and by the Inspector of Schools of the Naval School, which will be presently described.

The Instruction in the Upper School, which is conducted by the Rev. James Hill, M.A., the Head Master, embraces the usual subjects of a general English Education; and such branches of the Mathematics as are necessary for the study of Navigation and Nautical Astronomy; including Geometry, Algebra, and the elementary Trigonometry; and, in the Lower Mathematics, Practical Astronomy, with Mathematical and Physical Geography.

The boys are divided into three classes, each having its respective Master, with an Assistant-Master for the first Class.

By a late order from the Admiralty, the Head-Master is authorized to have six pupil-teachers, selected from the boys, (or other School,) to assist him in the duties of the school, and he themselves instructed in the art of teaching, in order to their after employment in a similar capacity in the Royal Navy. Lectures on Geography, Magnetism, Light, and Optical Instruments, are delivered from time to time by three Masters, to the whole of the boys of the Hospital Schools; in each wise that each boy, during his term, attends a Course of 160 Lectures

On being transferred to the Nautical School, which is conducted by Mr. Edward Riddle, and his Assistants, the boys receive their strictly professional education, the course includes Algebra, Euclid, and Spherical Trigonometry, (both theoretical and practical), Navigation and Nautical Astronomy; instruction in the use of the Sextant, deflecting Circle, Azimuth Compass, and the Artificial Horizon; and the number of Observations recorded, is, at least, 100,000 per annum.

Mr. Riddle, the Head Master, is a Member of the Council of the Royal Astronomical Society, and has the reputation of being one of the best observers with the Sextant in the world. This may, in a great measure, account for the extraordinary exactness of the youths under his tuition, in the very difficult use of the Sextant; many of the pupils being competent to take from 6 to 10 altitudes, (which can be confided in), in ten minutes.

Under Mr. John Riddle, aided by Mr Muggeridge, the Boys are instructed in the practice of Marine Surveying, by Mr. J. Riddle, Mr. Baillie, and Mr. Muggeridge, the Junior Masters of the Nautical School.

Many instances might be related of the Boys having distinguished themselves as navigators One of these, whilst still an apprentice, was appointed to the command of a whaler, to navigate the Boys, (or other School,) to assist him in the duties of the school, and he themselves instructed in the art of teaching, in order to their after employment in a similar capacity in the Royal Navy. Lectures on Geography, Magnetism, Light, and Optical Instruments, are delivered from time to time by three Masters, to the whole of the Boys of the Hospital Schools; in such wise that each Boy, during his Term, attends a Course of 160 Lectures

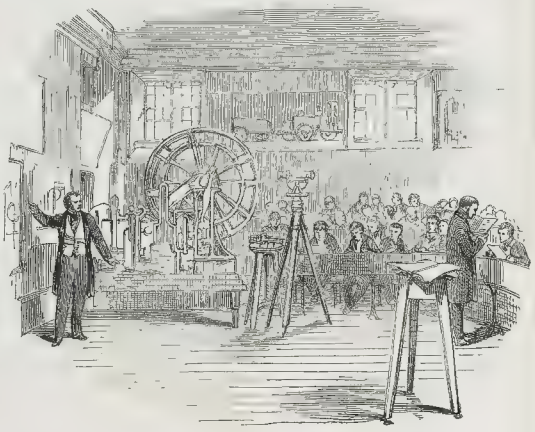
UPPER SCHOOL.—THE REV. J. HILL'S CLASS-ROOM.—MATHEMATICS AND OPTICS.



LOWER SCHOOL.—LESSON ON STEAM MACHINERY.—MR. E. HUGHES, HEAD-MASTER.

The Candidates must be free from impediment of speech, or other infirmity. They derive their claims of admission from the comparative merits, services, and sufferings, of the father in the Royal Navy; regard being also had to the number and destination of the family. The vacancies are filled up strictly on this principle; the admissions being carefully selected from the list of candidates by three of the principal officers of the Hospital, subject to the approval of the Governor.

The course of Education embraces religious instruction and the ordinary branches of English learning. In the first class, which is under the immediate tuition of Mr. E. Hughes, Head-Master, the course is extended to Geometry, Algebra, Navigation and Nautical Astronomy, Engineering and Steam Machinery, Chart and Mechanical Drawing. The latter subjects are taught with especial reference to qualifying Boys for the Engineering department of her Majesty's Steam Navy.

After a recent examination of this Class, by Mr. Loyd, the Chief Engineer of the Admiralty, he obtained the appointment of a certain number of Boys annually, as engineers apprentices to the Steam Factory, at Woolwich Dockyard.

Professor Moseley, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and Inspector of the Greenwich Hospital and the Dockyard Schools, in his Report for 1846, laid before Parliament, says, with reference to the first class:—"Taking into my view that a great number of Boys received into the Lower School cannot read on their admission, that their residence in it is commonly limited to three years and that one third of their time is taken up in industrial occupations, I consider the proficiency of this class a very remarkable result, not surpassed in any other elementary school in the Kingdom, and an instructive example of that which may, under favourable circumstances, be achieved in elementary education."

This School (as a Government institution) was formerly called "the Royal Naval Asylum;" and was a separate establishment, under different management, and totally distinct from Greenwich Hospital.

The Naval Asylum was originally founded by a benevolent individual, Mr Thompson, and was first conducted on a small scale at Paddington, supported by voluntary contributions. (See "Memoirs of Earl St. Vincent," vol. ii., p. 48.) In 1805, this School was taken under the charge of the Government; Commissioners for its management were appointed by warrant of King George the Third; the sum of £20,000 was voted in aid of it by Parliament; and the Establishment was afterwards supported by national grants, included in the Navy Estimates.

In 1807, the Royal Naval Asylum, (then containing from 40 to 50 Boys,) was removed from Paddington to the Ranger's Lodge, Greenwich Park. In 1809, the Establishment was enlarged, so as to accommodate 700 Boys and 300 Girls. In 1821, by warrant of King George the Fourth, the Royal Naval Asylum was united with the School of Greenwich Hospital, and placed under the management of the Governors, Commissioners, and Directors thereof, for the time being. And, in 1829, by an Act of Parliament, (10 Geo IV., cap 28,) the general control of the Hospital and Schools, and of all appointments therein, became vested in the Admiralty.

The patronage possessed by the Chairman has been incidentally mentioned. It should, however, be explained that, in 1805, the Committee for managing the Patriotic Fund at "Lloyd's," voted the sum of £40,000 for the Royal Naval School, and, in August of the above year, £6,000, 3 per Cent. Consols (then estimated at its equivalent) were transferred by the Committee into the names of Samuel Thornton and John Julius Angerstein, Esqrs., two of the Commission in the Royal Hospital for its use. By this grant, the Committee obtained some privileges in the nomination of Boys to the Upper and Lower Schools.

THE SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Shortly after the removal of the Royal Naval Asylum from Paddington to the Ranger's Lodge, in Greenwich Park, two wings were erected to that building.

The centre and the east wing are appropriated to the Lower, and the west wing to the Upper School.

The wings contain the Boys' Class and School Rooms, Dormitories, Refectory, or Dinner Hall, and Chapel. Each wing has a handsome Doric façade, and is connected with the centre building by a colonnade of the Tuscan order; these colonnades forming a place of recreation for the Boys in wet weather. The grounds surrounding the buildings are tastefully laid out; and on the eastern side of it are the wash-houses, laundries, and other offices.

We now proceed to detail

A DAY'S SCHOOL DUTIES.

The Boys rise every morning at about six o'clock; a quarter of an hour is occupied in the Dormitories in dressing, and each Boy has to say his prayers before leaving.

The Boys are then marched down to the play-ground, and the Company whose turn it is first to wash, are marched direct to the Lavatory. The interim is employed by the other Boys in cleaning their shoes, and brushing their caps.

By about a quarter to eight o'clock, the Boys are all dressed and washed. At a given single from the bugle, they collect in military order, and are marched by the Sergeant over to the Dinner Hall. This occupies about twenty-five minutes, when the Boys are again marched out, and dismissed until about five minutes to nine o'clock, to amuse themselves in the play-ground. They then collect again, and are marched to their respective School-rooms; at eight o'clock, they are allowed ten minutes in the play-ground, for their return to the School-rooms, and remain there till twelve o'clock, when they are again dismissed into the play-ground.

A certain number of boys are then marched in Sword Exercise, Gymnastics, and Gunnery, and, at a quarter before one o'clock, all the Boys assemble, and, preceded by the Band, march to the Dining Hall. After dinner, they return to the play-ground, and, at five minutes before two, they are marched to School, as in the morning, ten minutes being allowed in the play-ground during the afternoon.

At five o'clock, the Boys again leave School, and amuse themselves in the ground until 10 minutes before six, when they have their supper. At about seven, they are marched to the Reading Rooms at 9 o'clock, they are marched to their Dormitories, where, having said their prayers, they retire to bed by half past 9 o'clock.

Great attention is paid to the Dietary, which consists of tea and bread for breakfast; for dinner, meat and pudding on alternate days, with beer and potatoes; and bread and milk for supper. On each of the four annual festivals, and on Christmas Day, the Boys have roast beef and plum-pudding.

The quality of the food is very good and sufficient; as, from 30 to 50 lbs. weight is frequently removed from the Hall table after dinner. Under no pretence whatever would the Lieut.-Superintendent suffer any meat to be served except such as is in strict accordance with the contract.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

We conclude with an enumeration of our Artist's Illustrations, and a few additional details.

LOWER SCHOOL.—Here is shown the first-class receiving from Mr. E. Hughes, the Head Master, a lesson on Steam Machinery, with especial reference to the Engineering Department of her Majesty's Naval Service.

EXERCISING GUNS is the subject of the Illustration in the centre beneath the above. This is shown on board the Model Frigate, constructed in the school grounds for this purpose, and engraved in No. 68 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

DINNER.

GYMNASTICS.—The two side Illustrations show the descent and ascent of the pole, or model mast. In one of these exercises, the Boy places his hands round the pole, and his bare feet against it, and then runs up the pole without bringing his body in contact with it.

NAIL-MAKERS.—Here are shown Boys learning to make Nails and Hammocks, knotting and splicing, under the tuition of Condy, the well-known Hospital man.

BLACKSMITHS.—Here are seen Boys at such smiths' work as is required for shipping.

SEXTANT OBSERVATIONS.—The Boys of the Upper School are here taking observations with the Sextant, and recording the same, accompanied by their Master.

MARCHING TO THE DINING-HALL.—The Boys march to the Hall in the order here shown, whilst the Band plays a lively air. We may here add that the Boys of both Schools are frequently drilled, and put through a course of bodily exercise by experienced drill-masters, they are likewise instructed in music, in which many of them attain considerable proficiency.

THE DINNER.—The Boys having entered the Hall, two and two, as above shown, grace is said, and then silence until the Boys are told to begin their Dinner, during which they are allowed to converse.

THE CHAPEL.—In this large View is shown the location of the boys during DIVINE SERVICE. The Band sit in the organ-loft; the LOWER School next the organ; the Upper School under the Governor's Seat; and the Nurses and

The Lavatory.—The water and towels are provided for the Boys as shown in this illustration. From the large pipe runs a jet of water, and above it is soap, for each Boy's use; and over the pipe hang the towels.

The Dormitory.—The Boys sleep in hammocks, as here ranged. Each Boy, when he rises in the morning, makes his hammock, and at morning and evening he kneels in prayer be-ide this sea-bed.

We subjoin an interesting testimony to the improved discipline of the Schools, which we have received from a young man, lately a pupil. The writer says:—

"Many reports have been promulgated with respect to ill-treatment by the Drill-Masters and misconduct of the Boys, I must state that I was a pupil of the Lower School, under nearly all its recent changes and improvements, and tha. such reports are entirely without foundation. The education I acquired there has enabled me to obtain a valuable situation; and, though now entirely unconnected with the Institution, I shall always esteem it one of my highest privileges to be allowed admission to see my late schoolmates and schoolmaster, to the latter of whom I shall ever feel grateful for the kindness and care bestowed upon me whilst under their charge. It is this which will tend materially to strengthen the attachment of the Boys to them, and to the Institution, and make them feel pleasure in revisiting it when they are no longer pupils

"Such misconduct as the Boys were chargeable with in former times has long since disappeared. Cases of running away are now of very rare occurrence, and other rebellious conduct has altogether ceased. Of the whole 800 Boys, only one or two have been severely punished * in a period of six months; a circumstance which appears almost incredible when compared with the number of punishments formerly inflicted. Owing to the laxity which then prevailed, the position of the Drill-Masters, at the commencement of their duty, was most difficult, and they were compelled to exercise a certain degree of severity to bring the Boys to anyth ng like order; but, th s being once established, to severity succeeded kindness, by the practice of which, and also constant attention to the comfort and personal appearance of the Boys, proper subordination has been ever since effectually maintained.

"It is, however, to the Lieutenant-Superintendent, Mr. Rouse, that the highest credit is due; as the improvement effected in the discipline is, in a great measure, the result of his exertions; and he has constantly endeavoured to inspire the Boys with a feeling of self-respect. Before his day, punishment was looked upon by the Boys as no disgrace, and more than forty boys have been flogged in one morning. The improvement has been gradual and constant, and were a Boy to be now guilty of theft, he would require the protection of the Drill Masters to shield him from the effects of the indignation of his schoolmates. Should anything occasion the removal of Mr. Rouse from the schools, the Boys would lose in him, (although a very strict disciplinarian,) a friend whom it would be difficult to replace, whose whole heart is in their welfare, and who has secured both the affections of the Boys and the respect of the Masters. When, during his sojourn in the Schools, a Boy's conduct has been exemplary, on his return from a first voyage, the Masters have, occasionally, gratuitously given up a portion of the little leisure time which they possess, to improving him in his knowledge of Navigation; and Lieutenant Rouse has entirely instructed one Lower School Boy in Navigation, after his return from sea. Such kindness is well appreciated by the Boys.

"Attached to the establishment is a large Bathing Pond, where the whole 800 Boys are taken every other day, viz., 400 daily. In two divisions (morning and evening) of 200 each, and where they learn to swim.

"I have found the musical instruction which I received in the Band not only an advantage but a comfort to me.

"In conclusion, I have the authority and permission of the Registrar-General of Seamen at the Custom-house, for stating that complaints by captains of ships against Boys from the R. H. Schools are less frequent, and of a more trivial character than is the case in regard to any other class of apprentices.

"Captain the Hon. R. Keppel (now in command of H. M frigate Meander) who was educated at the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth, whilst under the superintendence of Lieut. Rouse, has just taken with him thirteen boys from the R. H. Schools, and has also, in forming the Meander's crew, given a preference to all seamen brought up there.

In conclusion, we learn with much pleasure that from the great interest taken in this Royal establishment, by Admiral Sir Charles Adam, the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, and by Rear-Admiral Sir James Gordon, the Lieutenant-Governor, it is expected that the Hospital Schools will shortly be enlarged, so as to enable them to receive 100 additional Boys.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1848.

While several of the Sovereigns of Europe are, willingly or unwillingly, granting Constitutions to their subjects, the British House of Commons has occupied itself this week in suspending one. It is no great loss, indeed, seeing that it has never been put in force. It was a paper Constitution, drawn up in the Colonial-Office for New Zealand, and so exquisitely ill adapted, in every respect, to the settlement, that when it arrived the Governor refused to proclaim, or have anything to do with it. The whole thing was highly characteristic of our colonial impolicy. When the Whigs came into office, in the middle of 1846, Earl Grey, in the fragment of the session from June to August, resolved to give a Constitution to the New Zealanders. Why the plan was formed, and forced on in such haste, never appeared; and it was completed seemingly in ignorance of the circumstances of the Colony, or disregard of what was known of it, if the knowledge existed. It went out, and was sent back again. This took about a year; and now the House of Commons is asked by the same Government to undo all that it then did at the Government's own request. The only merit of the Colonial Minister in this case is, that he is not ashamed to confess the blunder; the rashness and ignorance that made him commit it remain the same. After all the negotiations the Colonial-Office has had with the New Zealand Company, with the Colonists, with men of all ranks connected with the settlement, with the sources of information at the command of a Minister, the possibility of his taking such a step, appears nothing short of infatuation. Running the gauntlet of such a debate as that of Monday night is the slightest penalty he could expect for it.

This still-born Constitution is not repealed and cancelled; it is only suspended for five years, the Governor being left to his own discretion in the interval. But that the Charter will ever be put in force again, no one anticipates; it is said it may be amended; when the time comes it will be found much easier to construct a new one altogether. And then the construction of it should be based on the suggestions made by the colony itself; we have little faith in the paper perfectibilities that issue from the pigeon-holes of Government departments. The vice of all newly-balanced and elaborately-drawn Constitutions is, that they are too good for their purpose; few things in this world turn out exactly as men anticipate; the virtue of a Constitution is in the hearts and souls of a people, not a sheet of parchment. The freest Constitution will turn to despotism and tyranny in the hands of races who have not the virtues of freemen;—witness Spain and Portugal. To draw up an elaborate scheme of Government, requiring all the political training and habit of political action which England has only acquired through ages of contest, is the blunder of a pedant who thinks that words and phrases are realities. Governments and systems only succeed when they grow up naturally from the soil; then they adapt themselves to the circumstances of the case. To give a Constitution perfectly modelled, with all nicety of checks and balances, to a settlement where half the population is just emerging from savage life, is a degree of absurdity hardly to be expected in an English Minister at this period. But Colonial Government is an exception to all ordinary rules of action.

Earl Grey has, perhaps, been misled by taking too sanguine a view of the state of the friendly tribes of the natives of New Zealand. They are a fine race, with many excellent qualities: they have a keen eye for their own interest, can raise a crop, breed pigs, and carry on a petty traffic with great success. But we do not believe they are politically "of age;" all their progress has been made under the guidance of the white man: it would puzzle and embarrass them were they placed on the same level with him; in fact, it would only be done in appearance—the European would still be the leader and master. In the first years of a Colony, nearly all that is wanted is personal liberty, security for property, and fair play both to natives and settlers. Leave both parties alone, or with the minimum of interference, and we will answer for it they effect all this by themselves. But if they are perplexed with the orders of a not very wise Governor, acting on not very clear instructions from a Power some thousands of miles off, nothing but calamity is the result. All the misfortunes of New Zealand have been caused by over government. There is no variety of charter, compact, dispatch, instruction, minute, letter, understanding, treaty, public orders, secret orders, and all the host of official forms to which the unhappy colonists have not been martyrs. And what has it all resulted in? After the crowning blunder of a Constitution that would not work, Governor Grey is left to—circumstances, and his own discretion! This is the simplest and wisest course that could be taken; and, if a man of insight and common sense had been selected at first, this might as well have been done eight years ago as now. The great curse of our colonial system is the political and family interest by which alone the Governors are appointed. Fitness or talent is quite secondary, a mere matter of chance; even Captain Grey is a kind of lucky accident. The Colonial Office, of course, feels that its agents so appointed require guidance; hence the "instructions" they are loaded with. These documents are written at a great distance, often on perverted information, and arrive months after the emergency. Yet they must be acted on; for to leave men to act on their "own discretion," who may be quite destitute of the quality, is quite impossible.

There is one curious point about the defunct Constitution which is worth noting. It revived in another form the old "benefit of clergy." A reading knowledge of the Latin language once exempted the possesser from capital punishment. If a native of New Zealand could read and write the English language, and was duly qualified by property, he was to be admitted to a share in the Government. But the literary acquirements of the aborigines seem to have been over-estimated, the Governor declaring that in the north of the island none were to be found possessing the legal amount of learning. The truth is, with a good deal of shrewdness, and a certain talent for turning the penny by trade, the New Zealanders are yet in arrear in a literary knowledge of English. We do not know what degree of perfection in the elegances of our style and language was to be the legal standard; but, remembering the slender qualifications in this particular occasionally exhibited by some Peers of the Realm, the colonial authorities could not decently be very exacting. To have required more than will do for the House of Peers would have been unreasonable. To make up for their deficiency in English we can bear witness that the natives can write their own language with exceeding clearness and force. In the late Parliamentary papers the documents given in the Maori tongue are, in our opinion, superior to the despatches of the Colonial Secretaries. They can never be misunderstood, which is more than any one can say of the State papers of Mr. Gladstone. They compress into a few words a direct meaning, like the orders of the Duke of Wellington, which are exactly what all military orders should be. In reading these infant efforts of native diplomacy we feel there is a great future in store for the race. They have vigour and sense in them, powers of self-command and perseverance. They are a perfect contrast to our much talked of friend, Quashee, who, after all the millions we have lavished on him, seems incapable of rising above a very inferior state, either in Africa or in Hayti, where he has had a fair chance for half a century.

The exceptions are individual cases. No European nation could make slaves of the New Zealanders if they tried. They have already their merchants and shipowners; in the last Blue Book, a list of forty-five vessels is given, the owners of which are all natives carrying on a coasting trade; it seems a pity to trammel such natural vigour with the artificialness of Politics and Constitutions. Ministers of State talk much of the value of "free institutions," in utter forgetfulness of the fact, that the freest of all is that State in which people are left to themselves. After a good deal of suffering, it is to this state New Zealand has returned.

St Mark's Church, Old-Street Road.—We have learned during the week, with much satisfaction, that the difficulties respecting the assignment of the district for the new Church in Old street-road, engraved in our last number, have been removed, and that the consecration may be expected in a very short time. The Church is dedicated to St. Mark, and the district attached thereto, is formed out of the parishes of St. Luke and Shoreditch, with a population of 6400. The Rev. W. Rimson is the incumbent.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved a vote of 8,000,000l for the Consolidated Fund.

THE BUDGET.

Precisely at five minutes past five o'clock, Lord JOHN RUSSELL rose and said that he felt his health unequal to the task he had undertaken, and would content himself by laying before the house an outline of the financial statement he intended to propose, and leave the detail to future discussion He would therefore lay his statement at once before the house It would be remembered that for the last eighteen months the country had suffered under great distress, and to which was to be added the fact of a war in a foreign country having been carried on. The distress was such as few countries had known for many years. With regard to the price of articles of food he would just call the attention of the house to the fact that, in the year 1846, the price of wheat was 70s. per quarter; in Nov. 1847 it was 70s. in May of the same year it rose to 102s. 2d., and in September again it fell to 79s. 6d., being only a difference of 6d. in the quarter, to the price in 1846. He would now call attention to the rate of interest demanded by the Bank of England at the same time The rate of per centage charged by the Bank in the year 1846 was 3 per cent.; in April, 1847, it was raised to 5 per cent; in September of the same year, it was raised to a further increased rate of 8 per cent.; and in January of the present year, it fell again to 4 per cent At these periods, it would be observed that the amount of bullion in the Bank was 15,780,783l., that was in the year 1846; in 1847, the amount was 17,786,059l., and in February of the present year it was 20,821,784l Now in order to account for the great difference in the price of wheat, he had mentioned it should have had some effect on manufactured articles; and that fact would be seen by the state of employment in Manchester. In 1846 the number of persons employed in Manchester was 16,489; in 1847 the number was 14,852, and in 1848 the number was 35,146. The number employed at that time were, in 1846, 13,404; in 1847, they were 14,417; and in 1848 they were only 6901. At the same time it would be found that the number of unemployed persons were, in 1846, 5600; in 1847, 11,615; and in 1848 they were 7514. The noble lord read a statement of Mr. Huskisson in 1813 to support the view he took. His lordship, referring to the balance-sheet, stated that the increase of expenditure over income was 2,956,882l. Amongst items of expenditure, the sum for Ireland figured largely The noble lord then gave the estimate of receipts, which were as follows: Customs, 19,774,000l.; excise, 13,340,000l.; stamps, 7,150,000l.; taxes, 4,340,000l.; property-tax, 5,480,000l.; post-office, 923,000l.; crown lands, 60,000l.; miscellaneous, 320,000l.—total, 51,389,000l. The noble lord then made a statement of the increase that had taken place up to 5th January, 1848. On sugar, 540,000l., rum, 71,7-4l.; which with some other articles would make the amount 643,254l.; and on tobacco, cheese, &c., 26,000l. The decrease was on the following articles:—On corn, 705,360l.; on timber, 143,709l.; and on wine, 122,350l. In the excise, the decrease had been on malt, 164,000l.; spirits, 699,000l. The total loss for the year being 1,389,000l. The estimated receipts for the ensuing year were 51,309,250l. He would next take the item comprehended by the customs, which he set down at 19,755,000l.; the excise at 13,200,000l. because it was not expected that there would be much increase to be expected from the malt and spirit sources. He had estimated the revenue from stage coaches at the sum of 500,000l., that from the stamp-tax at 7,200 000l., the taxes at 4,300,000l The income tax for the year 1846, was 5,844,000l; in 1847, it was 7,464,000l; and for the year 1848, it had yielded 5,200,000l. The estimate he had made for the year was 5,000,000l.; and of the revenue from Crown lands at 60,000l., and the year ensuing he had taken it at the same. The miscellaneous estimates he had set down at 480,325l., and he would take them for this year to be 300,000l. By these figures, it would be seen that the whole of the estimates amounted to 51,250,000l., and here he begged to remind the house that the income tax from the China money was no longer to be expected. (Hear, hear) Then, taking the expenditure of the country at 52 310,709l, and the estimates for the next year at 51,250,000l. there would remain a deficiency of 1,065,709l. He should remind the house also that there had been an increased expenditure in the navy in the year 1846, which, added to the expenditure of the Kaffir war, made together 1,600,000l.; making a total deficiency of 2,411,000l. Now this was the statement he had to lay before the House of Commons of the present financial position of the country. The noble lord said that the deficiency must be supplied either by taxation or by a reduction in the military and naval establishments of the country. The view the government took of the matter was this. He thought that, on the subject of the military and naval establishments of the country, extreme opinion had been expressed. On one hand, it had been stated that an invasion is likely to take place, that it could easily be effected; on the other hand, it had been stated that an invasion would not, could not, take place. He thought that there was no immediate reason to fear a rupture of the present peaceable state of our relations with foreign powers, particularly with France. Two great constitutional countries like England and France ought, he thought, ever to be friends. (Cheers) The noble lord, alluding to the subject of the Duke of Wellington's letter on national defences, stated, that nothing had given the noble duke greater pain than the publication of that letter—a letter written and addressed as a private communication. The noble lord then passed a high eulogium upon the patriotic character of the Duke of Wellington, and proceeded to consider the topics which the noble duke's letter had brought before the public. There had, he said, and he begged of the house to bear the circumstances in recollection, been many occasions in which this country had been nearly brought in collision with foreign powers He referred to the case of Mr. Pritchard, and to other cases on this point. With reference to the state of the navy, he should say that, for the last 200 years, the elements had acted in favour of the country, while their navies were engaged in war But, since the peace of 1815, science had made such improvement in the arts that their ships were now able to contend against the elements. And this brought him to the consideration of the position of the naval force of this country in comparison with that of France Since the revolution of 1830 France had been governed by a monarch eminently disposed to peace; but the navy of that country was not of very great strength, because France had not those vast possessions to defend in every quarter of the world which this country had. But, notwithstanding this, he found that a great navy she had taken place in the strength of the French navy, and the increase of the expenditure in this department of that country had been next 2,280,000l to 3,360,000l With further particulars upon this subject he need not trouble the house at any greater length, but the whole sum for the French navy for the year 1848, was 3,317,000l. But with respect to this country, he should say that the increase that had taken place in the expenditure of the army, navy, and ordnance, was from 11,730,000l., to 17,340,000l. He did not think that any great increase should take place in the strength of these establishments, for he saw no cause for alarm (Hear, hear.) He had therefore to state that the only increase now to be proposed was 164,000l. in the navy, of which 50,000l was for purposes not strictly naval. He also proposed to have reserved squadrons at Plymouth, Cork and Sheerness While upon this subject, he should state that the sum of 262,000l had been expended in the making of docks in this country, and in the year 1844. With regard to the army, he would observe that since the termination of the Indian war, the army in this country had increased to 55,000 men. But it would, he expected, be further increased should take place in the strength of these establishments, for he saw no cause for alarm (Hear, hear.) He had therefore to state that the only increase now to be proposed was 164,000l. in the navy, of which 50,000l was for purposes not strictly naval. He also proposed to have reserved squadrons at Plymouth, Cork and Sheerness While upon this subject, he should state that the sum of 262,000l had been expended in the making of docks in this country, and in the year 1844. With regard to the army, he would observe that since the termination of the Indian war, the army in this country had increased to 55,000 men. But it would, he expected, be further increased should take place to 56,000 men. He would not further enter into this subject, as it would be brought before the house in the army estimates; but he would just state that the amount of those estimates would be 43 000l. It was also proposed to make a very considerable increase in the ordnance department, as well as in the store of gunpowder and other ordnance stores. The estimate for the navy would then be 76,000l.; for the army 13,000l.; making the sum 243,000l. making a total of 308,000l. With regard to the manner of carrision.ne the forts, he should remind the house that that was a matter which was attended with many difficulties These difficulties he proposed to meet by a measure which would be laid before the house. He meant the enrolment of the militia, for which purpose a bill would be laid before the house, and for this purpose he proposed to take a grant of 150,000l., in the first instance. Now with regard to the total expenditure of the country, the estimates would be found to be as follows:—He had not down the funded debt at 27,178,000l.; the unfunded debt at 752,650l.; making together a sum of 28,530,000l.; the Consolidated Fund, 2,750,000l; the expenses of the Kaffir war were 1,100,000l.; the excess of the navy expenditure would be 1,100,000l.; the navy estimates, 7,726,610l.; the army estimates, 7,162,995l.; the ordnance, 2,974,835l.; the miscellaneous estimates, 400,000l., making a total of 54,446,500l.; to which was to be added 150,000l. for the mill fix, making a total of 54,596,500l. He now had to state that it would be necessary to impose additional taxation on the country, for the reasons he had stated, such as the cost of the Kaffir war, which was 1,000,000l., and, though that war was at an end, the bill for it was not, and the other items he had mentioned (Hear, hear) It would not be wise to impose indirect taxes upon articles of consumption, and therefore it was proposed to increase the income-tax. (Hear, hear.) It was proposed to continue that tax from April next for five years, and to increase the tax from 7d. to 1s. in the pound, or from 3 to 5 per cent, for two years (Hear, hear.) The great distress which had prevailed in Ireland of late was such that it was not considered that the present was a fit moment at which to impose that tax upon that country. (Hear.) With regard to the taxes that had been taken off, articles of produce had last commenced, salt, candles, coals, leather, beer, and cider—the tax removed from candles amounted to 483,000l., from salt, 1,450,000l.; from coals, 898,000l.; from leather, 600,000l.; from beer and cider, 3,800,000l.; and from butter and other articles, the sum which made a total of 10,544,000l. of taxes removed from different articles of produce. He should also state that since the peace the total amount of taxes removed from articles of the produce of industry amounted to the large sum of 23,744,000l (Hear, hear.) The amount of the income-tax he had taken to be 5,200,000l, which would leave the whole of the revenue of the country at 54,750,000l., which would leave a surplus of 153,500l. He had now only to say, in conclusion, that he had fully and fairly, and at once stated this, what perhaps might be called the odious part of his duty, but it was a duty he owed to the country: it was a duty, the discharge of which in the house upon a former occasion enabled this great country to repress a rebellion in Canada, to put down the war in Ireland, and to preserve in safety their vast colonial establishments, and to ensure the great benefits from result from any action or any quarter whatever. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. HUME had never listened to a budget with more pain than he had listened to the one now proposed to the House. He should resist addition to the taxation of the country; he would, on the contrary, rather propose reductions. He thought it monstrous that, in a time of peace, we should be supporting 300,000 armed men.

Mr. BANKES also expressed dissatisfaction at the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. B. SOBORNE thought that the country would receive with consternation the statement of the First Minister of the Crown. He thought it would make the Monarchy most unpopular. He considered it perfectly practicable to reduce the naval and military expenditure as to render it unnecessary to inflict so heavy a burden of additional taxation upon the people of the country

The Right honourable GRAHAM, in the course of a long speech, gave it as his opinion that the cause of the alarming deficiency in the revenue might fairly be ascribed to the fatal influences of the Free Trade measures

With some observations from Sir B. HALL, Mr. ROEBUCK, and Colonel SIBTHORP,

Mr. F. BARING could not approve of the manner of meeting the deficiency proposed by Lord J. Russell. He could not think that an Income Tax should make part of the general burden of taxation. The hon gentleman entered at some length into a consideration of the causes which had induced him to oppose the Income Tax on the occasion of its first introduction. He especially thought that a distinction should at all events be made between the taxing of property and the taxing of industry He was still, however, of opinion that an Income-Tax was altogether a bad tax.

Mr DISRAELI attributed the recent commercial distress, the present embarrassed state of the finances, and the consequent proposed increase of taxation to the system of Free Trade The hon. gentleman commented severely upon the duplicity with which Sir Robert Peel had acted in reference to the introduction of the Income Tax. It was, he said, only natural and just that they should receive the proposition now submitted to them with some suspicion, seeing the experience they had of the conduct of Sir R. Peel on a like occasion. With reference to the question of National Defences, the right honourable gentleman expressed his satisfaction at the peaceful state of Europe, and likely to be destroyed. He saw no reason which should induce the noble Lord to bring forward a War Budget.

Mr. COBDEN was not surprised at the desponding nature of the budget. It was but the case of every private firm in the country. He complained, however of this, that the Government should endeavour to decrease their expenditure to a level with their incomes they had, on the contrary, sought to raise their income to a level with their expenditure. With reference to the question of armaments, he regretted that the Prime Minister should have adopted language showing the preparations made by France, with a view to raising similar preparations here for it; he feared France would look upon it in the light of a menace. Whence all the fuss, of late, about a war? The Queen's Speech spoke of perfect amity with France Had her Majesty spoken truly in her speech or not. The fact was the augmentation of our own navy had given France a pretext for increasing hers. Why, he would ask, was the Reform Assembly had been held all over the country to deprecate all addition to our military and naval armament Had it was at such a time that the proposal of armaments was made Its had not been made at such a time, such a course. With reference to the case of Mr. Pitt, the hon gentleman stated that the obstinacy of a monarch, and the ambition of the aristocracy, impelled him into a war with France; and no other cause. France never would, however, had greatly changed since then. The noble Lord's allusion to the affair of Mr. Pritchard at Tahiti, he looked upon as another proof that passion was not reason. There was other reason France never would have existed as this country was, it was too bad to bring forward a proposal to increase our armament, especially, too, when the people were themselves averse to it. He thought that the naval and military armament of this country was quite sufficient. Why war against an improbability? He would not consent to a shilling's addition to the army and navy estimates. With regard to the Income Tax, he did not consider it against that system But there was one of the Honourable member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). Then were taxes pressing upon the people quite as harshly as the Income Tax raised upon persons of property at the time of the Free Trade had not carried the day it was those who supported profligate expenditure, such as the hon. member for Buckinghamshire, and those who acted with him. If we had kept our armaments as they were in 1835, we might now dispense with the Income Tax, Window Tax, and other taxes. He begged of the Protectionist party to give up their obsolete ideas. Their leaders had dropped off they never could revive their dead and gone pet. They never would get a Corn Law again, he could tell them that. The honourable gentleman then entered into some statistical details to shew that hitherto, when the prices of corn were low, a diminution had taken place in the naval and military expenses. Protection he looked upon as moonshine. The Protectionists had much better assist the Free-traders in their efforts to bring about a peaceful economy in this country. This he thought would induce a friendly feeling between the nations of the world. He had never said that Free Trade would, if carried out in its true spirit, be a panacea for all the miseries of the two great nations—France and England.

After a few observations from the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Sir R. PEARS, Mr. MONCKTON MILNES, and CLAY TON, in favour of the Government, and, policy; and from Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. NEWDEGATE, against it, the House adjourned at one o'clock.

NEWRY, WARRENPOINT, AND ROSSTREVOR RAILWAY.—The half-yearly meeting of this Company was held this day, at the offices, Moorgate-street. The Earl of Newry in the Chair The Report of the Directors stated that they had taken the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and that they had come to a decision of delivery for the formation of a single line; that the opening of the line to Warrenpoint would take place next summer, which would ensure a prompt return for the outlay; and, therefore, they had not recommended to pay an interim dividend without delay The report of the engineer stated that all the works on the line were in a state of forwardness. The statement of the receipts and expenditure was next read, by which it appeared that the sum received by calls, &c., amounted to £549,958 17s. 9d., and the sum expended left a balance in hand of £1245 3s 10d. The sum required by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act—namely, half the capital having been paid up, the meeting was made aware of the purpose of enabling the directors to avail themselves of the borrowing powers given by that act. After a short discussion, the report was adopted and the accounts passed, and the meeting separated.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ROME. MEETING AT MANCHESTER.—At a meeting held on Thursday evening, in the Free-Trade Hall, to protest against the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Pope, there were upwards of 4000 persons present. The oratory was of the vehement character usual on such occasions, and discussed rather the tenets and proceedings of the Catholic Church, than the subject upon which the meeting had been convened. The meeting was quiet and unimpassioned, not one-half of those present voted on the resolutions. The clerical speakers were the Rev. Messrs Butler, Osborne, Cerve, and Stowell several lay gentleman also spoke, and petitions to both Houses of Parliament against the bill were agreed to, and placed at the doors for the reception of signatures.—London Telegraph of Friday

MORNING IN THE COUNTRY.—Pottieton still slept; later, possibly after the excitement of the previous day. There was a golden blush in the sky over the end of the valley, but the weathercock had not yet caught the rays of the sun, and the diamonds that would sparkle on every blade and leaflet when it came out, were still drops of dew. Nobody was moving; a few early birds and squirrels rushed about amongst the trees; and now and then a lark set off upon a high mission to see whether the sun was coming or not, making his glorious song of joy and excitement ring through the clear morning air for a mile about. The field mice, as well, scuffled amongst the corn; and little shrews peered, with prying sniffing noses, from the ends of their burrows, to see what kind of a look after their breakfast, tolerable sure that the owl had gone to bed at last without a similar unpleasant tea ch for his own. There was not even a streak of smoke to mark the pre-sence of life as it rose above the cottage, nor any country sound to be heard; for the very watch-dogs were asleep, like tired policemen Yet such goodly odours came from the fresh earth opening petals into the pure air, that they who missed them knew not what they lost.—Albert Smith, in the London Telegraph

THE CONVICT WILLIAM ALLNUTT. This young villain, convicted of having poisoned his grandfather, at December Sessions of the Central Criminal Court, was on due course removed from Newgate to Millbank Prison, from which latter place he has since been draughted, by order of the Home Secretary, to Parkhurst Prison, Isle of Wight

RECLAIMED DIVIDENDS.—By a return, printed on Thursday, it appears that on the 5th inst., the dividends due at the Bank of England, and not demanded, amounted to £296,583 10s 7d., of which £288,291 18s. 9d. had been advanced to the government under three acts of Parliament

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE. On Wednesday intelligence reached Lloyd's of the total loss of the Lady Louisa, of Fowey, together with the whole of her crew (ten in number), on the Hooper's Sand, off Llanelly, on the night of the 31st Instant. The steam tug, Sampson, put off to the assistance of the crew, but it was impossible, but, by the time she reached the wreck, the whole of them had been washed off and drowned.

THE O'CONNELL ORATION.

ON Thursday, the 10th instant, the Cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris, was the scene of a politico-religious demonstration in memory of the late Mr O'Connell. Several members of the O'Connell family were present, by invitation, at the Cathedral, and at the entrance and principal altar of the Cathedral were hung with black fringed with white. As early as ten o'clock, the [illegible] ...ches were completely crowded, notwithstanding a rather h[illegible] ...ave was divided into [illegible] ...ats, and at twelve, the vast church was quite full. Amongst those assembled, including a vast number of ladies, were many of the principal aristocracy of Paris, as was shown by the extraordinarily great number of splendid equipages which occupied the place in front of the Cathedral. Count de Montalembert, the leader of the Catholic party, and, it is said, the garter-up of the whole affair, was present, as were also the ladies of several of the Ambassadors, some of the chief officials of the Royal household, a great number of Peers and Deputies, artists, literary men, students, some members of the corps diplomatique, Among others the Austrian Ambassador of Austria and the Pope's Nuncio. All the young men of the Irish College were also in attendance

At a few minutes past one o'clock, the Archbishop of Paris took his place in the sanctuary, seated in front of the pulpit. He was supported by the Bishops of Orleans and Evreux, by the Clergy of the Cathedral, and by the parochial Clergy of Paris and the vicinity.

Almost at the same moment, the Abbé [illegible] ...scendaler, the eloquent "preaching brother," who had been selected to deliver the oration, ascended the pulpit, wearing a surplice over his monk's dress. The congregation immediately subsided into silence, and the Abbé offered up a solemn prayer. He then addressed the Archbishop and the congregation, as is usual in France, with "My Lord and Gentlemen," and proceeded to deliver his Oration Unfortunately, he spoke in so low a tone, that he could not have been heard by half the congregation.

The Paris Correspondent of the London Telegraph, whence we quote these details, says—

"After some introductory observations, he narrated the birth and life of O'Connell, dwelt on the unhappy situation of Ireland (the whole cause of which he, as a matter of course, described to be the measure a tyranny of I land), and set forth in glowing terms the struggles which the Agitator had maintained for his church and country. He recognised in him, he said, the envoy of God, sent to prepare the way for avenging the immoral inequities of which his country has been the victim. The whole oration was admirable from one end to the other—admirable, I mean, from the effect it produced on the auditors, which is the true test of eloquence. The orator, however, was admirably adapted for the scene and the congregation to which it was addressed. Generally speaking, it was listened to with breathless interest, but at times the emotion of the hearers was so great as to lead them to make no noise than would have been deemed becoming in a Protestant Church

Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., in a letter addressed to the Repeal Association, thus speaks of the above ceremony—

"The powerful, the soul-searching eloquence of Lacordaire was yesterday responded to by thousands of his generous fellow-countrymen, assembled beneath the noble arches of Catholicism's Cathedral of Notre Dame. The tone of my beloved father never was greeted in Ireland with warmer, deeper and [illegible] ...stic feeling than yesterday by the assembled multitude, comprising every rank and every class of the inhabitants of that city!

"Ladies, the noblest and the fairest in the land, went round through the immense crowd when the sermon had concluded, to collect for the relief of the suffering people of Ireland, and even the very coarest there contributed his mite with a willing and an overflowing heart."

GRAND PERFORMANCE OF "OEDIPUS," AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE

On Thursday evening, the 10th instant (the Anniversary of the Marriage of the Queen), her Majesty had an evening party at Buckingham Palace, at which was performed a Selection from the "Œdipus of Sophocles," with the Music of the late Dr. Mendelssohn; an abridged version having been written and adapted to it expressly for her Majesty, at the Prince Albert

It was recited by Mr. Bartley and the author, who, as upon the occasion of the performance of the "Antigone" at Windsor, assisted him in this manner. A numerous and judiciously selected mess of voices, professional and amateur sang with great effect, their efforts being ably sustained by her Majesty's band, increased for this occasion by a number of the most eminent instrumentalists of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Anderson directed the whole performance with his accustomed ease and ability, greatly feeling the execution to be difficult and elaborately-wrought music—a most favourable prelude to the noble pendant to the "Antigone"

An Invocation for Œdipus to the Powers of Hades was charmingly sung by Messrs. Genge, Peck, C. Beale, and Collet, forming a quartett into which the chorus at its conclusion glides most effectively

The "Descriptive Chorus of Attendants on the State," "The War Chorus," and "The Thunder Chorus," went off most impressively

The following had the honour of receiving invitations—the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer, the Prussian Minister and Madame Bunsen, Mademoiselle Bunsen, his Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Lords Ashley and Adare, the Marquis of Anglesey and Lady Adelaide Paget, the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, the Earl and Countess Portsmouth, the Countess Spencer, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Viscount Jocelyn, Viscount Morpeth, Lord and Lady Ashley, Hon. Miss Lyttelton, Lord Edward Howard, General Hon. A. Upton, Major-General the Hon. — F. and the Hon. Miss Cavendish, Mr. G. E. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, Col. the Hon. C. B. and Mrs. Phipps, Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, and (2) Misses Gardiner, Lady Caroline Cocks, and Hon. Miss Facet.

At the close of the performance, the Queen and Prince Albert were pleased to express to Mr. Bartley their most gracious approbation of the admirable manner in which he had officiated as reader of the tragedy.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were also pleased to express to Mr. Bartholomew their gracious approval of his translation of the work.

Our Illustration represents the Rehearsal of the Performance, at which were present her Majesty and the Royal children, the Duchess of Saxe Coburg, &c.

PERFORMANCE OF THE "OEDIPUS," AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE, BEFORE HER MAJESTY.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

We this week resume (from Page 88) our Illustration of this important Exhibition.

The present Engravings are from

No. 401. "Hush." H. Le Jeune. A very clever picture, by a young artist of very great promise. It is well composed, full of sentiment, and rich and harmonious in colour. We look with interest in every Exhibition for the works of Mr. Le Jeune. Next is—

454. "The Morning of Life." R. S. Lauder, R.S.A. A variety of productions by this Artist, of which we give the form and composition, but we cannot give the delicacy of handling and harmony of tone which are its most prominent characteristics.

We now resume our notices, in the numerical order of the Catalogue

In the Middle Room we are first attracted by 151, "View from Symonds Yatt, looking towards Ross, Monmouth." J. Tennant. This is a large picture, and includes a great extent of country in its horizon. It is, doubtless, a very fine work; but its beauty would have been greatly enhanced by more breadth of touch in its foreground details

152. "Head of a Child." J. Robertson. A very successful portrait of a select model

168. "Sappho." L. W. Desanges. Why does this artist persist in choosing singularities of effect for the subjects he paints? He draws well enough and paints well enough to be independant of trick; and can well afford to undertake pictures on which the [illegible] light rest without attention to the obtrusive claim of some mechanical effort that forces itself into prominence. In this picture we forget Sappho and her despair, while examining the success of the artist in the task he has set himself to paint the carnations of female flesh under the opposite illuminations of Moon and lamp-light. This is a prostitution of high art unworthy of Mr Desanges' talent

176. "Gypsy Encampment." R. Brandard. A nice little circular picture

177. "In the Church of St. Roque, Lisbon." J. Holland. A clever interior; rich in effect, but very sketchy

182. "Italian Boy playing the Hurdy Gurdy." M. F. Halpen. The town has seen so many pictures of Italian boys, as to have become somethi[ng] [wea]ry in their regard, and the execution of [this] is not sufficiently good to justify the repetition

183 "Snowdon, from near Tremodoc, North Wales." T. Danby. A very beautiful and [lov]ely picture perfectly original in its treatment, without a [tou]ch towards eccentricity. The air and water are eminently transparent, and we have never seen space more gracefully represented. This picture establishes Mr. Danby's claim to a place among the first rank of landscape painters.

185 "On the Skirts of a Common." G. A. Williams. Something dark in touch, but pleasant to look upon

187. "Gil Blas in the [Pal]ace of Presents from the Prince of Spain to Catalina, a Sketch for a Picture." T. M. Joy. A very nicely-toned sketch

188. "Syrinx." W. E. Frost, A.R.A. A gem of the very first water [in] which in colour, beautifully drawn, [and] [illegible] We are, however, [illegible] but, with proper care by the hangers, subjects may be chosen for elevation that are not injured by removal from the eye. It would be much better to reject a delicately painted work altogether, than place it so entirely out of reach as this is

195. "Shylock, Launcelot, and [Jes]sica." [illegible] wood. We refer to this picture for the purpose of remarking that composition must be contrived with reference to form and breadth of effect. The story seems here to be told rather with reference to probability of situation than to the picturesque in grouping.

196. "Old Scullery at Ightham Mote." W. S. P. Henderson. Well commenced as a Sketch.

203. "The Castle of Esa, near Nice, on the Cornich[e]." C. R. Stanley. Is not the mistiness of the middle distance something conventional? The clearness of the atmosphere in the sky and extreme distance does not seem to us consistent with the veil thrown over parts of this picture [illegible] A Pair of Lovers (as we suppose) in the costume of the Spectator [illegible]ge on the grassy turf, in a park-like landscape." J. Noble. This is a pleasing picture of the Frank Stone manner. The female's drapery is well painted; and a charming air of confusion depicted in the fair one's countenance; but we do not comprehend the expression of the man. It is not love, certainly; and we find, therefore, some fault of intention that does not apply to the quotation accompanying the picture. The genre department of subject insists upon a clearness in the meaning that shall leave no doubt.

205. "The Village Forge." R. Brandard. A very clever picture indeed, and full of elaborate detail. Indeed, the preservation of the multitudinous objects with which the smithy is strewed, form a confusion that has endangered breadth; and, although the picture still possesses sufficient of that quality to escape the reproach of its entire absence, the effect does not recommend a repetition of the experiment. The artist has adapted his chiaro oscuro to three tones of light—that of sunshine in the foreground, the smithy fire beyond, and the blue of evening entering from a window in the back. These are harmonised successfully into a consistency that satisfies the eye.

209 "Loch and Ben Rosse, Sutherlandshire." J. Giles, R.S.A. Clever, but lacks subject.

210. "Red Cap." G. Lance. "Repeated from the picture in the cabinet of W. J. Broderip, Esq., at the request of Robert Vernon, Esq., to form a part of his munificent gift to the nation." Again an instance of munificence in the amateur and excellence in art. The well-known subject of a monkey protecting fruit. Pug has the expression of a Poor-Law Guardian interrogating a starving pauper.

[illegible] "Pontico del Panchi, on the Grand Canal at Venice." W. Oliver. Rich in colour, but frittered in effect

216. "Temple of Jupiter Olympus, Athens." G. E. Hering. A nice picture of its class.

221. "Proteus and Julia." W. Carpenter, jun. Cleverly painted, and delicate in sentiment. It is the passage in which Proteus employs Julia to present the ring she had given to him as a love token to her rival. The expression of Julia's countenance is full of feminine and graceful passion.

[illegible] "Dogs in a Quarry." C. Hancock. A very small picture indeed

[illegible] "Cannes, South of France." E. W. Cooke. A little too much of sharpness in detail is here mischievous to an otherwise pleasant picture [illegible] "Industrious Amusement—Sixty years ago." G. Lance.

"Her slender fingers wove the filmy lace,
And innocence was written in her face"

Mr. Lance here demonstrates that he is not a mere still life painter. A young lady, seated in a high-backed carved chair, and dressed in a flowered gown and damask petticoat, with a lace cushion on her lap, among the bobbins of which her delicate fingers seem to move. This is a very pleasant picture, painted with all the conscientious truth of finish we are used to see in these subjects considered more especially this artist's department

228 "A Tired Wolf Reposing on his Prey." Klor[illegible] undoubtedly a production of considerable merit; [illegible] snarling wolf, with a murdered sheep in his [illegible] not subject to look upon.

[illegible] "Temple of Vesta, at Tivoli." G. F. Hering. [illegible] story in effect.

[illegible] "Psyche, from the Fable of Apuleius." R. L. We do not know who R. L. is, but there is a great deal of talent in his sketch [illegible] "A Sketch from Nature." R. W. Buss. An artist overtaken by sleep while at work, sketching from nature.

249. "Joseph, having interpreted the Dream of the Chief Butler of Pharoah, is interpreting the Dream of the Chief Baker." Sir George Hayter, M.A.S.L. This is almost the only picture in the gallery that has well founded pretensions to the higher department of pictorial art. There is something of the French school in its ordonnance, but not to an offensive degree. The costume is well considered, the drawing learned and refined in character, and the arrangement effective. The expressions of the various countenances so appropriate as to indicate great mental effort in the artist. The colour is sober, but the tone mellow and consistent throughout. Sir George Hayter takes a new and a much higher position as a painter by this picture. We look in vain for a certain hardness in execution which was formerly his reproach. We know no instance of such a step in advance by one so long an artist.

243. "Falagne in the Apennines." W. Oliver. If Mr. Oliver would infuse a little tone into his pictures, they would be much improved.

244. "The Treasured Relic." D. Pasmore. Here is a picture, with careful

"THE MORNING OF LIFE."—PAINTED BY R. S. LAUDER, R.S.A.

painting, approaching to high finish, that has all its good qualities negatived by neglect of breadth as a contrasting intention [illegible] "Fruit Piece." W. Duffield. Very finely painted; and a picture that would take a high place in its department, but for the gorgeousness with wh[illegible] Mr. Lance has decorated such subjects.

[illegible] The Confluence." M. Wood. Nice; the flesh something red [illegible] Smiths, Yorkshire Coast." J. B. Pyne. Replete with all the delicacy of handling that has made this artist the inventor of a style. All is select truth; the water polished, and the atmosphere consistent throughout, aerial perspective being assisted by increasing breadth of touch as objects approach the spectator.

248 "The Roadside Barn." H. Jutsum. A nice picture, but a little more force in the foreground would rather benefit than injure its effect.

249 "Rosalind and Celia Deliberating on the Means of Quitting the Court of the Usurping Duke." Miss J. Sutherland. In case of incurring the charge of being ungallant, we must protest against this picture being placed where it is The work itself is not advantaged by the preference, while an injustice is done that may be severely felt by some rejected artist much more worthy of the situation thus occupied.

255. "Market People at a Printseller's Window." G. S. Reynolds. In spite of some weakness in the manipulation of the heads and hands there is a great deal of reality in this picture.

[illegible] "The Vicar's Family." W. P. Henderson. Lots of [illegible]ren take lessons in perspective before [illegible]

[illegible] "Trees on the Dora, at the foot of the Val d'Aoste, Piedmont." H. J. Johnson. There are some pleasant appearances in the distance of this picture that injure its effect by forcing the eye to notice its secondary in preference to its principal characteristics

258. "The Bird-Trap, Frost Scene." C. Branwhite. Children constructing a snare for birds in a large picture of a frozen mill-dam, with a well-composed distance. We would council the artist to apply himself to the drawing of the human countenance, or else to leave it out in his pictures; or, what would be, perhaps, easier to accomplish, to get the assistance of another artist in that department. Proud names among celebrated painters have given this assistance. There is abundant evidence of a nice perception of natural effects in this picture. Its composition, as to form and linear perspective, is admirable, but space is not sufficiently illustrated by breadth of tone: the eye is fatigued, and the chief [illegible]ccure is frittered into minutiæ that destroy its masses. Its beauties are very numerous, and its deficiencies but few; these few are, however, among the essentials.

[illegible] "A Study." J. P. Herring. A study, containing the heads of three white horses, full of animated expression.

[illegible] "A Water Mill, with figures." J. Peel. Clever, with gracefully touched [illegible], and figures well drawn. If the artist would pay more attention to the form of his [illegible] he would add an attraction

271. "Summer; a Glade in North Wales." H. J. Boddington. We think this the best of Mr. Boddington's pictures in the Exhibition. It is very happy in its form, and effective in colour [illegible] "Scene in the Trossachs, off Erich." T. S. Robins. A clever picture, but Mr. Robins's oil painting are not yet equal to his water-colour performances.

[illegible] "The Cotter's Darling." J. D. Marshall. An interior attempted in the Wilkie manner We cannot praise this picture; it has been commenced without the [illegible]rspective, and the composition is straggling and without intention it is, moreover, very unequally painted, which, in a subject of its description, is [illegible]t a deficiency

[illegible] "A Railway Recollection." Frank Williams. A young man, very smugly [illegible], [illegible], title a-tête with a fine girl; we can conceive the [illegible]dity of such a journey. This is very well put upon the canvass.

383. "The Sleepy-Book." F. Mogford An interesting toy causing the leaves [illegible] a picture-book for the amusement of a lively little girl, his sister—no doubt. portraits. Well, painted, and broadly effective.

[illegible] "Farmyard." W. and H. Harrison. If these artists would give more time to the details of their pictures, their value would be much increased

298 "The Irish Mother." A. D. Fripp. Full of character and effectively composed, but wanting delicacy in drawing

91. "The Confluence of the Rivers Conway and Llugwy, N. Wales." E. J. Cobbett. A large horizontally extended picture, of much and well-supported pictorialism. The spectator standing on a height from which he looks down, as it were in a map, a great extent of country, in which linear and aerial perspective are well preserved. Some might object to its being rather too map-like

307. "A Study." H. W. Phillips. A very fine study of a young man [illegible] than costume the countenance full of nobility in expression.

[illegible] "The Captive." W. Fisher. There is much to praise in this painting. The unwilling favourite of the harem reclines upon cushions of flowers, sadly ruminating on the recollection of home and friends lost to her for ever. She is waited upon by a female black slave, who holds a cup of coffee for her acceptance unheeded. The picture is well painted in the accessories, and full of natural truth pearly in tone and soft in texture. The drawing is of a refined character, and the feet and hands of the captive, particularly the former, exquisitely manipulated The general effect of the picture is controlled by a nice perception of harmony in colour.

[illegible] "A Shady River—Summer." F. R. Lee, R.A. A very excellent specimen of the artist's best manner; crisp in touch, sunny, and full of natural truth

315 "A Study." T. Chittenden. A half length of a man in armour. The [illegible] seems to be some well-managed form in the painting or this; but it is too high for us to pronounce positively as to its merit

318. "A Mill, at Arundel, Sussex." T. Dearmer. How very much a little attention to breadth would have done for this picture!

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

PARIS, Wednesday.

The new hall at of "Gruselda: ou, Les Cinq Sens," will be produced to-night at the Académie Royale de Musique, but I shall be unable to forward you a notice in time for your next number. The "Christopher Colomb" symphony of Pasdeloup's band, was given to-day in the Jardin d'Hiver, with an orchestra of 200 players. Company has also a concert at Erard's Rooms, but these events, for the same cause, must stand over. Madame Pleyel, who created a perfect furore at Cinti Damoreau, is about to give a grand concert here next week. She has gained in her playing since she quitted London. Her Concerto in E flat, has celebrated her matchless performance in an eloquent article in last Sunday's Revue et Gazette Musicale. There is a strong probability that Madame Pleyel may visit London this season. She is now the greatest living pianist.

I have received letters from Berlin, describing the rapturous reception bestowed on the 2d inst., on Madame Pauline Garcia Viardot, who appeared in "Iphigenie en Tauris," the first two acts being Reilhig's version of Shakespeare's tragedy, and the third act extracted from the opera of "Vaccaj," which is considered (I mean the last act) a masterpiece. As an evidence of the furore provoked by Madame Viardot's indefinable acting and singing of Roméo, the opera was repeated on the following Friday by general desire, an unprecedented circumstance at Berlin, and despite of the great success she had achieved in Donna Caterina (Bon Gouvernail), which had been announced for the Friday.

A new opera, by Pacini, entitled "Esther d'Engaddi," has been produced at Turin with success. Mdme Eugene Garcia, the Basso Derivis, and the Tenor Soldi, sustaining the principal parts. Mdme. Alboni, Persiani, Tadolini, Frezzolini, and Montelli (a basso), have been singing in an opera in Belgium. Tamburini performed Don Giovanni for his benefit, at the St. Petersburgh Italian Opera, amidst the greatest enthusiasm. Graziani, the first dramatic tenor, has created a Russian lady of large fortune, but he does not intend to leave the stage, and will go to the Académie Royale. Last night I was present at the second performance of Rossini's Gazza Ladra, the first representation having been given for the benefit of Lablache. Grisi was Ninetta; Alboni, Pippo; Coletti, Fernando; Tagliafico, Febrano; and Lablache the Podesta. There was an unfortunate tenor, Colini, in the lover, who created no small degree of hilarity. Grisi was in splendid voice, singing the "Di Piacer," with the greatest brilliancy. Alboni's Pippo is one of her best parts. The duo in the prison scene between her and Grisi, "Ecco per mia Memoria," was received with great applause. As Verdi's opera will be diminished at the end of this month, by the departure of Madame Persiani, Mdlle. Alboni, Madame Bellini, Signor Ronconi, and Signor Poloni, who leave for London, for the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden.

On Monday last, was presented, as the French say, at the third representation of the new opera of "La Nuit de Noël," libretto by Scribe (of course) and music by Henri Reber, at the Théâtre Royal, de l'Opéra Comique. I saw Meyerbeer, Halevy, and Auber, in the boxes, and in the stalls, the well-known face of the enthusiastic amateur Sir Henry Wyatt. M. Reber has acquired some fame in this capital, for his instrumental writings. I have been formerly present at his concert, and heard his symphonies with much gratification. In this, his first operatic attempt, he has had what the critics call a "succès d'estime," that is to say, in other words, means an honourable fiasco. There is a considerable difference of opinion as to his merits. The lobbies on the occasion were loud in their praises; the orchestra very severe I think the truth is between the two extremes. Reber has had the disadvantage of an indifferent libretto. M. Scribe, out of materials for one act of interest has manufactured three heavy acts, and yet the story is in a nutshell. In a place in Germany, no matter where and what years, a [illegible] who at midnight on the eve of Christmas see their shadows pass in the church [illegible], and while a person [illegible] Albert and Bourreau (Mocker and Malle. Darcier), who have strong domestic quarrels, are brilliantly employed by an intriguing widow and her lover, a schoolmaster, believing in the superstition, meet in the dark and tank they are about to die, but the pastor of the place, a benevolent clergyman, after reading them a lecture, undeceives them as the clock strikes twelve, and in every they agree to live happily for the future, the schoolmaster being punished by his wife being discovered in an intrigue with the lord of the village. The mistake of M. Reber is in having written a comic opera—his position is at the Académie; and this conclusion may be safely drawn from the last act of "La Nuit de Noël," in which there is a duo between the lovers, and then a trio, of large proportions, highly dramatic and impulsive. The orchestration of M. Reber is admirable, the descriptive portion of a snow-storm, whilst Henriette troubles with cold, is an excellent conception. The legend-ballad heralds the bearer of the "Pain Divin" "à fremble," strikingly. The opera was well acted by Mdlle. Darcier, Mdlle. Lemercier Meeker, Ponchard, jun (the Baron), Requier (the Schoolmaster), and Bussine (the Pastor).

Osborne, the composer, has arrived to pass the winter in Paris At the Concert of the Revue et Gazette Musicale, a new pianist, M. Blumenthal, made a very favourable imp ression, both as a composer and pianist. Mdlle. Antonia de Mendi, the co usin of Malibran, Pauline Viardot, and Manuel Garcia—what a triad of talent! sang several airs at t e Concert with the greatest success. Her voice has gained in power considerably since her début in London.

Mdlle. Leopoldine Blahs, the Viennese dancer who made her début on the 31st ult., in Plunkett's pas in "Jerusalem," at twenty-four hours' notice, a surprising feat—repeated in the Friday night, and was immensely applauded. She is only seventeen, has great personal beauty, and is of the Elssler school

CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE CONCERTS.—On Tuesday night, Mr. Sterndale Bennett gave the first Classical Performance of Pianoforte Music at the Hanover-square Room; the scheme comprising exclusively gleanings from Mendelssohn and on Thursday, Mr. Lindsay Sloper opened his series of Pianoforte Music at Wells's Rooms. We were unavoidably absent, but shall attend the second performance.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Haydn's "Creation" was given on Thursday night at Exeter Hall, Miss Wallace, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Leffler, and Mr. H. Phillips, being the principal vocalists. It was the first appearance in London of Miss Wallace, who is a sister of the celebrated pianist, Mr. Vincent Wallace. We must reserve our notice of the performance until the next publication

THE MUSICAL CHAIR AT OXFORD.—The appointment of St. Henry R. Bishop, Mus. Doc., to the Chair of the Oxford Musical Professorship, vacant by Dr. Crotch's decease, has given general satisfaction to the musical profession.

MUSIC FOR THE WEEK.—On Tuesday next will be celebrated, at Freemasons' Hall, the 140th anniversary of the Royal Society of Musicians.—On Wednesday Mr. Willy gives his Quartet Concert at Erart's Rooms.—On Friday will be the first meeting of the Musical Amateur Society, with Mr. Lucas as conductor. On the same evening, the operatic campaign will terminate at Drury-Lane Theatre

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE

It was a praiseworthy act to mount Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," although the resources of the theatre were not sufficiently strong to supply a strong cast. Bochsa having served up the opera for the public taste, displayed in a much more advantageous light as a Conductor than on any previous occasion, except at the memorable concert, directing his own works. If he did not colour the dram situations so vividly as we have been habituated to, still he was a careful and conscientious reading of the score, and, had he been better seconded by the leading vocalists, would have told more. Mr. Wrey Mould's version in the "Standard Lyric Drama" is selected, as the recitatives being excused greatly, and the airs of Basilio and Marcellina omitted. The most effective vocal execution was from Miss Miran, in the Page; and, when she has acquired more stage experience, her Cherubino will be a very interesting performance. Her two airs were charmingly sung. Mrs. Lee read rather than sung the music of the Countess with intelligence, but her voice is far too weak for the theatre. Miss Birch's intonation was at fault in the Susanna at times, but her musical requirements were shown favourably on the whole. Weiss's Count and Whitworth's Figaro were both dismal they ought to have exchanged characters.

PRINCESS'S

M. Scribe has written, as all the world knows, so many plays, that [illegible] one might be acted on the same night in every theatre all over France; and English dramatists can scarcely form a notion of the money he derives from their representation. Ballets, comedies, dramas, vaudevilles, all come alike to him; but, possibly, he never wrote anything more inconsistently strange than the drama of "La Déesse," which was produced a little time back at the Opera Comique Theatre, for the purpose of introducing the charming Rose Chéri in a new character. A translation of this piece was brought out last week at the Princess' Theatre, under the title of "Nadia; or, the Goddess of El Dorado"—in which the sparkling Anna Thillon sustained the chief part. The story is wildly improbable, and not of the most comprehensible; but this is somewhat near it. The popular deity of the Brahmin temple in El Dorado—the original name of which we cannot call to mind—has flourished for some time past as a green monkey, has died. His place is to be filled, however, forthwith, and the election falls on Nadia, a lovely, simple girl, brought up in the temple by the Chief Priest and his wife, who is severe, when quite a child, from a vessel wrecked on the coast of the island. She falls in love with a young Arab sailor, whom the High Priest has picked out as an advantageous match for his niece; but, finding the couple determined to transfer their affections, he proclaims that the attributes of immortality have been withdrawn from the goddess, and she must quit the island Her father, who was with her at the time of the wreck, and thought him dead, returns to his allegiance, her father comes into an [illegible] fortune, and all are made completely happy.

Madame Anna Thillon's graceful naïveté, and general acting and singing, we question whether the piece would have been even tolerably successful from the confused absurdity of the story. But her delightful performance kept the audience in perfect good temper; and, as the whole weight and interest of the drama rested entirely upon her shoulders, she was enabled to carry it through to a satisfactory conclusion. She had some very pretty music to sing, the composition of Mr. Edward Loder, who appears singularly happy in writing for Madame Anna Thillon's voice and style. All her songs were encored, except one, and with honest enthusiasm. None of the other dramatis personæ call for any observation except Mr. Compton, whose quaint drollery is always welcome

Madame Thillon's engagement terminates, we believe, this week. She certainly has not made the sensation that she did upon her first appearance at this House, in "The Crown Diamonds;" but this must be attributed, in a great measure, to the very inefficient manner in which she was supported.

OLYMPIC

The sensation created by Mr Gustave Brooke's performances as Othello and Sir Giles Overreach, was rather increased than diminished by the announcement that he was to appear in "Richard the Third," on Thursday evening; and we have seldom witnessed so closely packed an audience as that which the Olympic Theatre presented a few minutes after the doors were opened. Not only every corner of standing room from which a glimpse of the stage could be obtained was occupied, but very many were content to remain in the lobbies and passages of the pit and boxes, where even hearing became a matter of some difficulty, leaving seeing altogether out of the question In fact, too many persons were admitted; and the same degree of warmth which we had occasion to speak of in our notice of "Othello" continued throughout the performance.

Of Mr. Gustavus Brooke's acting as Gloster, we much regret that we cannot speak in high terms. It fell very short of what we had anticipated it would have been, from his previous impersonations. Not that it was deficient in effective points—there were enough of these, as the rising applause in every scene testified; but they were physical rather than intellectual, depending rather on the power of lungs than of judgment The sensation created was vivid and marked, it is true; but it was more of that kind which any daring melo-dramatic actor would produce, than the result of a subtle expression of the workings of the mind by nicely managed tone or gesture. The scene with Lady Anne was by no means well conceived—he was the mask of hypocrisy so palpably, that she must have perceived it from the first address. The tent scene was powerfully played; and from this to the end of the play nothing could be finer than the performance; but there is no denying that the heartiest and longest continued applause was awarded to the combat, during which the audience were worked up to a singular state of excitement. And here Mr. Brooke fought like a lion; his rage and determination were absolutely terrific; and the death-struggle a fine artistic delineation At the end of the tragedy he was positively exhausted The continued strain of his really fine voice, modest harsh and grating; and we almost doubt whether his powers, great as they are, would have sustained much longer.

But whilst Mr. Brooke's defects—of a feeling of disappointment certainly experienced as we perceive them—we believe we may say with truth, that we have no one at present on our stage who can play Richard like him. And this was the general opinion of the house, gathered from the conversations of those persons intelligent and well-versed in theatrical affairs, who we collect in the lobbies after any dramatic novelty, to discuss its merits. At the same time, the size of the house is certainly against him. We are most desirous to see him in a theatre larger, and better calculated for the display of his powers.

Mr. Holl was a respectable Richmond; Mrs. Brougham a stately Elizabeth; and Miss May played Lady Anne very evenly, speaking with careful intelligence and great propriety. She is an acquisition to the company A very little child, Miss K. Archer, made on the first night of York and deserved all the applause that her clear and sensible delivery called forth. For the other performers we have only much, beyond that, generally, we have seldom seen anything so bad; an unpleasant truth which the manager must be aware of. The inattention of the audience to the stage, when Mr. Brooke was not on it; and the occasional merriment they indulged in at the expense of some unfortunate looking underling whom they fixed on as an object of merriment

Every thing connected with the mise en scène appeared to have been newly got up for the occasion, and reflected credit on the management; but we repeat we shall rejoice to see Mr. Brooke in a larger house, and more ably supported The Olympic Theatre, it is true, has served to introduce him to a London public; but the longer he remains there the greater injustice is doing to house!

Mr. Stocqueler's pleasant farce of "The Fortress" concluded the entertainments.

THE MARQUIS OF GRANBY.

The Marquis of Granby is the eldest son of the Duke of Rutland. He has sat in Parliament for the Borough of Stamford for ten years, and has filled an office in the Royal Household. But the past ten days have been the great epoch of his life; in it, the Protectionists deposed Lord George Bentinck from the Leadership, and elected him to the vacancy. Lord George is too liberal in certain of his opinions: the inference is, that the Marquis of Granby is not in advance of the party. But their choice was either premature, or the step was taken without the consent of the man they honoured with their choice: the arrangement had hardly been made, before the noble Marquis declined the greatness thrust upon him. Whether he thought with the poet, that or felt himself unequal to the duties expected of him, has not been explained; but the Marquis returns to his former position, as a prominent, but scarcely eminent, member of the Conservative Opposition.

Some never crowns
The champion of a falling creed,

The Marquis is in the prime of life, and has some good physical qualities, always of great advantage to a public man. He has the manly presence that fills the eye of an assembly. In voice, delivery, and style of speaking he has the superiority over Lord G. Bentinck, to whom it is positively painful to listen. The qualities yet to be shown are the industry, the courage, and unconquerable perseverance of the late Leader. In the debate of Wednesday on the Bill for Removing the Penalties of certain Acts of Parliament affecting Roman Catholics, the Marquis of Granby spoke, for the first time since his temporary, and, as it appears, undesired elevation. He was therefore listened to with some degree of interest. Men who are selected for Leaders must have something in them. But the little he said had been said twenty times before, and made no impression. "Good sentences, and well pronounced," is a full description of it; but his fine strong voice and clear utterance furnished a startling contrast to that of Mr. Shell, who jumped up the moment the noble Marquis took his seat, and began his address to the House in a perfect shriek! The Protectionists are not giving signs of strength in these changes. It is a bad symptom for a cause when the ablest men desert it; it is not mere volition or intrigue on their part; the hackneyed cry of treachery is of no avail; it is the force of circumstances, rendering past policies impossible. From Peel to Bentinck was a heavy declension; from Bentinck to Granby is not an ascent; and now it seems doubtful if the party will be able to get any recognised leader at all. Lord George and Disraeli must serve it as distinguished volunteers.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

Express Train to Scotland.—Arrangements are being made between the London and North Western, the Caledonian, and the Lancaster and Carlisle Companies, to start an express train on the opening throughout of the Caledonian Line. The train, we understand, will commence running on the 1st March, starting from London and Glasgow at nine o'clock in the morning, to reach each terminus at ten o'clock at night.

South Western Railway.—The Chertsey branch of this line was opened on Monday, the road going off about a quarter of a mile beyond the Weybridge station, crossing the Basingstoke canal by the mills, having a station at Addlestone, and then coming into Chertsey about half a mile from the church, opposite the site of the old workhouse. There are, at present, four trains a day, and these will offer the greatest conveniences to the inhabitants, although it is a question whether it may not affect the business of the town in such affairs as grocery, the fashions, bookselling, &c., from persons being enabled to get their stock direct from town more readily, and at a less price than by ordering them of the resident dealers. Several of the principal tradespeople dined together at the Crown Inn, to celebrate the event. But few, if any, of the surrounding residents gave their countenance to the festivity, nor did any of the leading officers of the line attend, except Mr. Strowd, the general manager. This is to be regretted, since, had the affair been taken up by some one of consequence in the neighbourhood, a proper "inauguration" might have been achieved; as it was, the meeting was somewhat "flat, stale, and unprofitable."

The financial statement of the Great Western Railway Company, which has been issued previously to the meeting on the 17th inst., shows a revenue for the six months ending December 31, of £534,454, against an expenditure of £210,443. The balance of the general revenue account applicable to a dividend is £247,118. The amount of capital on which the dividend is to be paid is £5,157,800. Four per cent upon this would take £246,316, leaving a surplus of £1,802. Three-and-a-half per cent. would take £215,526, leaving a surplus of £31,792. The surplus carried forward after the payment of the dividend of 4 per cent. last June was £25,297.

HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.

Three "juvenile harpists," the Lockwoods, who made their first public appearance in the year gone by, on Thursday night resumed their early familiarity with the public ear, at a concert at these rooms. They are Masters Adolphus and Ernest, aged nine and eight years, and a piccolo Fanny, who comes seven in the scale—two we Apollos and a diminutive muse—to match. The trio have each and all considerable difficulty in clasping their instruments, and getting at the strings. Animated, however, by the inspiration of a genuine gusto for their art, they manage to get through their parts, which are combined with a skilful simplicity, with evenness and spirit. Herein lies the whole marvel of their performance, which, in very truth, is fitter for the educational closet than these rooms. These "juvenile harpists" are as yet only in the bud, and some half-dozen good summers of tending and training in the studio should be bestowed on them ere the concert-rooms" daylight and liberty bless the young flowers!" They were, however, much applauded by a very kind and considerably amused audience. The concert was supported by some choric contributions, both vocal and instrumental. Amongst the former was the "Nina" of Mme. Jaëll-Altès, sung by Madame Hebert with exquisite art and most admirable expression. It was rapturously encored. Mr Harrison gave Mr. Wallace's beautifully feeling air from "Matilda of Hungary" with considerable power of voice, and was also encored. Amongst the instrumental contributions to the concert we must refer to two pretty pieces of Schulert, by Lavenu, the first, a Hungarian air, for the pianoforte, the second for the violoncello and orchestra. It was warmly applauded, and by a room which was well filled with auditors.

FRENCH PLAYS.

Our Illustration is taken from the three-act comedy of "Rose et Marguerite," performed, for the first time in England, on Monday evening, on which occasion Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre with their presence.

The original piece was first played at the Vaudeville, in Paris, last autumn, and is of excellent construction. The Baron de Vilbac, a wealthy old gentleman, has two grand daughters, the heroines of the piece Rose (Mdlle. Baptiste), and Marguerite (Mdlle. Nathalie), whom he wishes to see well married; and he is very anxious that their cousin Frederick (M. Montaland), who is a genial fellow, very well off, and the favourite of every body, should have one of them. Frederick, however, is not a marrying man—as the effects of the "Tenth" is reported to have said in a similar position, "He didn't want the lady himself, but he'd mention her at the mess," so Frederick finds a valuable friend, Jules de St Yves (M. Fechter), who directly falls in love with both the sisters. He is loved in return by Marguerite, who is unfortunately engaged to a somewhat elderly banker, Mons. Perrin, (M St. Marc) Rose admires Jules also, but, with sisterly devotion; she determines that Marguerite shall be happy. So she tells Jules that he must not think of her, and tells Perrin that Marguerite does not care about him. This produces a great change in the positions of the parties. Perrin falls in love with Rose, proposes, and is accepted; the same thing happens between Marguerite and Jules, and the double marriage takes place in the middle of the piece. We next find Rose and her husband not forming a very lively couple, the banker being always wrapped up in his affairs, and his bride consequently neglected. On the other hand, Marguerite and Jules are as happy as the day is long, until Frederick brings the husband an admission to a club, which he frequents too much. Marguerite begins to suspect his fidelity, and receives information of her misgiving by some letters found by accident. She is perfectly wretched, when all is set right by Frederick's assurance that it has all been a little plot to try her; and that she and her husband will be happier than ever. Perrin, too, has turned out an excellent spouse, his abstraction and apparent neglect proving to have arisen only from his anxiety to provide a fortune sufficient to enable his wife to have everything she wished.

The piece was very favourably received, and, indeed, deserved to be, no less from the agreeable manner in which it was written, than from the fresh and charming acting of Mademoiselle Nathalie, who played to perfection, and was admirably seconded by Mademoiselle Baptiste. M Cartigny's Baron was delicious—a fine sterling impersonation of a fussy old man; in fact, all the performers were worthy of the highest praise. The names next in succession of the performers selected for the "stars" of the St. James's Theatre are those of M Lafont and M. Achard.

HER MAJESTYS THEATRE.—OPENING OF THE SEASON.

It is not the musical world which is alone interested in this subject. To the gay world deep is the interest in the opening of this great Institution, which was established by Royalty has been under every species of government: ruled by musical composers, like Handel, bankers, like Chalmers; noble lessees, like Lord Middlesex; speculators and men of straw, committees of noblemen, &c. &c. always widely different one to the present township, and still always the great and unique centre of attraction, so that, in fact, the opening of the Opera is the opening of the season. We have already paid some enumerated the resources of the present campaign. We have now to report as far as attentive observation at rehearsals can afford information what are to be the features of the opening night. The entertainments consist of "Ernani," and of a new ballet, "Flonia, ou la Reine des Elfrides." "Ernani," composed by Verdi, founded upon the celebrated drama of Victor Hugo, is not new to our Italian stage; it has often been performed since, three years ago, it was brought out at her Majesty's Theatre, and successfully interpreted by Madame Rita Borio, Moriani, and Fornasari. The cast, on the present occasion, is far more powerful. Charles V., at the time alluded to performed by a second-rate artist, is now enacted by the general favourite, Signor Gardoni, who has consented to fill this part expressly transposed for him in order to enhance the general effect. One of the most playful and fascinating melodies of the opera—"Vieni sinecta"—falls to his share, and it elicited applause from all present, not excepting his brother artists and the orchestra.

Signora Cruvelli, whose portraiture is faithfully given in our present Number, enacts the part of the heroine—Elvira. This prima donna, a pupil of the Conservatoire, and who has studied under several maestri of European fame, is eighteen years of age. Her countenance is pleasing and expressive; her form, of the middle height, is well moulded and handsome; her manner dramatic, and her style energetic. Her voice is remarkably powerful, her tones youthful and bell-toned; and, if it be found, when her powers are fully tried, that she possesses the complete management of her vocal resources, she will be one of the greatest acquisitions the theatre has ever made. This young lady is of German extraction, and an intense love of her art has led her to her present career. Hardly was her musical education finished, than she made her début, a few months since, in Italy, and excited from the first a great sensation. Report of her success spread rapidly: in the dearth of great, and, above all, of young artists of distinction, the impresarii from all quarters rushed to engage her amongst these, four of the principal operatic directors in Europe. Signora Cruvelli, however, amidst all the offers, only accepted a future engagement with Lumley. A vulgar, but rich and speculative, Italian tradesman, having one day heard him sing whilst travelling in the provinces, immediately bought up his services for three years, for a very small sum. The young tenor had from the first great success, and to hard did his leaseholder work his powers, that, at the end of the term, his health had seriously suffered. Having rested and recovered his health, amongst the numerous engagements offered him, he accepted one at Her Majesty's Theatre. He is young, handsome, above the middle height and, although hardly convalescent from a cold when we heard him, so that his voice was too much veiled to form a positive judgment, his tones were sweet, impassioned, and impressive. The baritone, Signor Biletta, who performs the part of Silvio, is a vocalist thirty-eight years of age, or more; of short stature, and peculiar countenance. The moment he sings and acts, his features are lighted up with a truly intellectual expression; his tones are genial, and the actions lose every other impression in the science, volume, and voluptuousness of voice he displays. Of "Floria," the new ballet—the scenario and choreography, are by M. Paul Taglioni. The music, which is lively, descriptive of the plot, and characteristic of the country where the scene is placed, Sicily, is by Signor Pugni. "La Tarentolella," "La Palermitana," are the native characteristic dances, of a romantic and picturesque style, which figure admirably in the ballet, whilst the imaginative pas, such as "L'Oubli," and "L'Assumption," danced, the first by Rosati, the second by Maria Taglioni, thanks to their fair representatives alone, could not fail of success. These are not the only dances introduced; there are others besides, in which appear, in addition to the aforesaid dancers, other youthful and fascinating performers, particularly Mdlle. Aussandon, Thevenot, Julienne, and Lamoureux. As to the plot, the following will convey a glimpse at the story:—

Tonello, a young Sicilian villager, is about to marry the lovely Floria. The happy couple, accompanied by their relations, are already on their way to the village church, when the terrible Hertha (Queen of the Elfins, or Evil Elves), casts an eye of love on the bridegroom. The power of Hertha is great; she can raise storms by her incantations; she can cause human beings to lose their vitality, and become senseless statues. A tempest separates the lovers, and Hertha, assuming the dress of Floria, lures Tonello to a cottage, and when discovered bears him to her enchanted gardens. These are delightful to look upon, but evil lurks beneath their beauties. They are adorned with seeming statues, the victims of Hertha's hate; they are watered with the stream of oblivion, one drop of which produces forgetfulness of the most sacred ties. But the powers of evil are not suffered to work without impediment. Anar, the genius of good, takes pity on the forlorn Floria, and conducts her to the gardens, where she appears to her bridegroom among the other statues. With a rose-branch, given to him by Anar, Tonello disenchants them all, and the sight of his Floria dispels at once the effect which the Elfin Queen had produced upon his heart. The sudden appearance of Hertha causes Floria to retire, but before she departs, she drops a nosegay, as a token of remembrance. Hertha must now have recourse to the stream of oblivion, if she would secure the affections of Tonello. The elves immerse his cap in the fatal water, and all thoughts of his Floria are at once obliterated from his mind. But Anar is not unwatchful, and, just as Tonello is about to resign himself to the charms of the Elfin Queen, the good genius removes from the head of the villager the cap that causes the delusion, and transforms Hertha into a statue, that she may stand an inanimate witness of the happiness of the Sicilian lovers.

THE SOUP KITCHEN IN LEICESTER-SQUARE.

On Tuesday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert visited the Soup-Kitchen established jointly by the Poor Man's Guardian Society and the National Philanthropic Association. The time was fixed for twelve o'clock, and precisely at that hour his Royal Highness arrived at 40, Leicester-square, and was received by Mr. Cochrane, the President, and Mr. B. Bond Cabbell, M.P., the Treasurer of the National Philanthropic Association, and a number of ladies and gentlemen, the friends and supporters of the two societies.

His Royal Highness first inspected the various models of the National Philanthropic Association for the Improvement of Roads; for sewage and drainage connected with sanitary measures; and the ventilation of dwellings, &c.

The party then adjourned to the offices of the Poor Man's Guardian Society. The Prince's attention was called to the system of providing model lodging-houses for the poor, as instituted by Lord Ashley.

Prince Albert and the ladies and gentlemen then walked up to Hamyard, Windmill-street, to inspect the Soup Kitchen, and where a number of poor were receiving relief. His Royal Highness twice tasted the soup, and pronounced it to be excellent, and made many enquiries as to the price of bread, ingredients, &c. Some gentlemen remarked that the soup was distributed by tickets and that some of the poor sold their tickets, to which the Prince replied that "the ticket would not fetch much, but that a bason of good soup and a piece of bread might keep a poor creature from starving, and that Soup Kitchens were very general on the Continent, and were found to do much good." His Royal Highness seemed very much pleased with all he saw and heard. The Prince was attended by the Hon. Colonel Phipps, and was cheered on his entering and leaving the Institution.

The Soup Kitchen in Leicester-square was first opened on the 19th of January, 1847, and remained in operation till the 20th of February,—during which time nearly 300 persons per day, accepted, with every demonstration of thankfulness and gratitude, the relief offered—viz., a basin of nourishing soup, and a half-pound of good bread to each individual. On the 11th of March, the Kitchen was again opened, a new soup apparatus having been erected in the interim, and soup continued to be distributed till the 24th of April. It was then stopped for want of funds.

From a record kept at the office, it appears that during the time this system of relief was afforded, upwards of sixteen thousand poor persons had been its recipients.

Among the subscribers to this Institution are His Royal Highness Prince Albert; Viscount Melbourne; Lord John Russell, M.P.; Lord Ashley, M.P.; the Governor of the Bank of England, &c. &c.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR CONCERTS.

Balls are beginning, Court mournings are almost over, and Concerts are the ground for evening parties. Our fair subscribers must be informed that an invitation for a Concert is not in general to enjoy the quiet delights of music, but means that the dancing party will be on a small scale; that, although they will dance, they must not expect the luxuries of a stylish ball, and that, in consequence, their toilets must be of a more serious disposition, and their lace skirts not got up with bunches of flowers.

Although simple their toilets may be in their appearance, they prove, in reality, to be a great deal more expensive than the most elegant ball dresses. It is for these Concerts that gowns of reps broché, of moire antique and brocaded satins, are chosen, illustrated with the richest laces and expensive ribbons. The most ornamented head-dresses are worn with these costly and heavy silks; garlands of flowers are equally elegant, and more becoming for young ladies.

Ball-dresses have been rather monotonous this last week in their shades, although ornamented with the greatest taste, and of the most perfect elegance, white, grey and black were the predominant colours. We can give the description of a sweet gown, which produced quite a sensation. It was made with two skirts of pearl-colour lace on a slip of taffetas the same shade. The first skirt was trimmed with two rows of draperies, each of them gathered by a bow of ribbon; the second row trimmed with a white blonde lace, falling in the interstices of the drapery. The second skirt, just placed over the draperies, was ornamented with pearl-colour ribbons, got up from the waist, and fixed nearly at the bottom of the skirt by a bow; every ribbon being trimmed with a blonde lace. The berthe was formed with blonde lace and plait lace; the shape of it was round, crossed over the shoulders, forming a drapery. This toilet was a perfect marvel of elegance and good taste; we can also recommend it as the most delicious novelty of these last days. Another dress really charmed us; it was in black lace; five lace skirts, quite plain, one over the other, rendered it so airy, so becoming to the figure, that we thought it most charming in its simplicity, and the choice of the black lace a great improvement to fair hair. In general this fashion of five lace skirts proves very becoming when worn by tall young ladies; but they are far from being pretty worn by a short lady. The great secret of true elegance is not merely in copying the general fashion, but in fitting it to one's own figure. The effect produced by a toilet always depends on the way of wearing it. A splendid heavy dress on a small, delicate, elegant-looking lady, will not be a showy becoming one, a light fairy-like toilet will be most ridiculous and unbecoming on a stout short person. If the Paris Fashions are so generally spread and imitated, it is because they are first of all worn by ladies of exquisite taste who give to all things that comme il faut not to be defined. Every fashion is not suitable to every lady, and every shade does not fit every complexion.

The engraving of this week gives a sketch of Concert-dresses. Green velvet crown, with a gathered flounce in pink crep up to the knee; deep black lace flounce over the pink one, gathered in draperies with Algerienne. Berthe in black lace. For the hand-dress, a small round cap in green velvet, trimmed with a wide black lace Pompadour's fan. The other figure represents a young lady: the gown is of pink glacé, all trimmed with satin ribbon, pièce à la vierge: a small garland of pink flowers with their leaves, and a large diamond rose at the bosom. Fans are always very stylish; and we may venture to say that there is no complete toilet without them. High fashion requires for evening parties handsome nosegays, whose size is now so wonderful that it is quite an annoyance to bear the weight of them

CUFFS

We give this number the pattern of the Cuffs: No. 1. Similar to the collar's pattern of last week, cuffs can be made in knitting or crochet work, but embroidery is far more elegant. In all cases it must be understood that cuffs are always worn of the same pattern as the collars. These slight details in the toilet of a lady proves, more than any luxuries, the good taste and the real understanding of the dress. We shall always feel happy, as competent in this question, to call the attention of our fair readers to such points as will give them the secret of Parisian elegance. Cuffs this year are turned over the sleeves, the sleeves of morning dresses being tight to the wrist. For visit dresses, cuffs can be ornamented with a ruffle of the colour of the dress. This ruffle encircles the wrist with a little bow over the hand. The insertion must be larger, to keep the lace under sleeve is de rigueur.

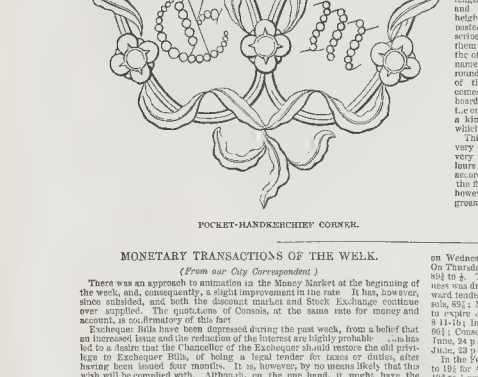
EMBROIDERED POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS.

Pocket Handkerchiefs are so very important in ladies' dresses, that everything connected with them must prove interesting. Plain Cambric pocket handkerchiefs are quite suitable for morning wear, but, if embroidered at one corner, they prove more stylish, and most ladies have either their crowns and initials, or fancy garlands and initials, embroidered, according to the pattern we give, No. 2, 3, 4. Red and amber work colours are usually preferred with great success, and these coloured embroideries on nice French cambric, are quite elegant and complete a coquet negligé. Pocket handkerchiefs richly embroidered in white cotton, and trimmed with laces, ought to be worn, only for dinner or evening parties. The proper laces to trim them are Valenciennes and Malines. Those laces must be adapted to the pocket handkerchief in that manner, that the embroidery covers the edging of the lace. Scalloped pocket handkerchiefs, with coloured silks, are out of fashion: they were rather elegant, but not lasting —garlands scalloped with white and red cotton have replaced them.

PAPER LIGHTER WITH CURLED LEGS.

THE BODY OF THE LIGHTER.—Cut a piece of white paper, nearly one inch in width and ten inches long. Roll this paper spirally round three or four rushlights together, and paste the top of the lighter. When it is made it ought to be six inches and a third in length.

ORNAMENTS FOR THE LIGHTER.—The ornaments consist of six branches.



POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF CORNER.

the paper being curled, and full, like a weeping willow. It will be safe ent to explain one of these branches, the other five being in the same manner Cut a piece of flower paper, of any colour you like, eight inches and two thirds in length, and two inches in width. Cut, with scissors, a fringe an inch and a third in depth; there then remain two-thirds of an inch of plain paper. The fringe is not very fine: you must give about twelve cuts in each inch When it is thus fringed all along, curl it by rolling four or five of the cut pieces between the scissors and your thumb; then on a knitting needle not very thick, turn the paper spirally. When you have arrived at the end of the paper, take out the needle Five more similar pieces of paper, curled and turned in the same way, join them together, so as to form a branch by the aid of a little paste, then paste them to the thickest end of the lighter. Four lighters of this kind make a very pretty full, each one is made of a different colour. The body is of rather strong white paper. The ornaments serve for several times.

ORNAMENTS FOR CANDLESTICKS

Cut a band of green cardboard two-thirds of an inch high and about two inches and a half long, make it into a round and queue it strongly. The round must be large enough for a wax candle to pass through. When the queue is quite dry, make twelve cuts at equal distances, care being taken not to cut it too near the other edge, as about a sixth of an inch must remain entire to surround the candles. Then open the twelve pieces of cardboard with a pair of scissors, in the same manner that children arrange straws for wax bubbles. On the cardboard thus prepared the ornament is made, in the following manner:

The first round is composed of a piece of paper of a pretty green, prepared for flowers, an inch and a third in height, and sixteen inches long. With very pointed scissors cut it on one side into a fine fringe, resembling that of a bonbon cracker, but only a third of an inch in depth. Take the cardboard in the left hand and the green paper in the right hand, with a brush and some paste, fix it inside the cardboard, folding the paper as you paste it to the divisions of the card; you will have to make about two folds in each division to use the sixteen inches in the round.

Second round, consists of a piece of paper of whatever colour is preferred This piece is two-thirds of an inch longer than the first, and the sixth of an inch higher It is cut in the same manner as the green one, and pasted inside the cardboard on the green, and folded in the same manner

Third round. A piece of paper, seventeen inches and a third in length, and an inch and two-thirds in height, fringed and pasted inside as described above. Past them one little above the other, that the ornament may be only rounded The fringe of the first round comes above the cardboard; the fringe of the second forms a kind of fine moss, which is very pretty

This little work is very amusing, and very cheap. The colours may be varied according to taste; the first round usual, however, always be in green paper.

POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF CORNERS.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There was an approach to animation in the Money Market at the beginning of the week, and, consequently, a slight improvement in the rate It has, however, since subsided, and both the discount market and Stock Exchange continue over supplied. The quantities of Consols, at the same rate for money and account, is confirmatory of this fact

Exchequer Bills have been depressed during the past week, from a belief that an increased issue and the reduction of the interest are highly probable. This has led to a feeling that the profit which would be made by merchants and tax collectors buying the bills at a discount, and paying them in for duties or taxes The latter case was practised to a great extent some years since, and led to the present arrangement of making the bills payable annually, and only receivable for taxes after the expiration of the year

Intelligence from Havre of the failure of the Banking Company known as Messrs. Dubois and Co.'s Commercial Bank, arrived in town on Tuesday. It has been in the habit of making large advances on cottons, and other produce to the merchants of the place; and the numerous failures which have occurred there during the last six or eight months have, it may be presumed, crippled its resources. The paid up capital of the concern was 4,000,000f. (£160,000), and the total liabilities are stated by some parties at 12,000,000f. (£480,000). Great excitement had, of course, been occasioned, as the shareholders are still liable to a call of 25 per cent. on their shares (70f only having yet been paid on the 400f shares). Additional accounts have since come to hand by the steamer from Havre, which state that the failure continues to exercise the most calamitous influence on the mercantile community at Havre. Business is quite suspended, and it is feared that most disastrous results will be produced by this unexpected suspension

The liabilities of Messrs W. Clay and Co., whose suspension was announced on Wednesday, are very limited, and the debts of the firm will be paid in full. It appears also that the stoppage was quite unexpected, and arose from engagements of a peremptory and peculiar character, entirely unconnected with their ordinary transactions

At the 12th annual meeting of the North umberland and Durham District Bank, held on Monday last, the following most important paragraphs in the report were presented:

"It will not have been expected that in a year like the past the Bank should have avoided losses to an extent larger than in ordinary years. At this early period it is impossible with accuracy to ascertain the value of securities held and to be applied as above suggested."

The state of affairs on the Continent caused a heaviness in the English market on Monday, and it was only towards the close of business that the prices of saltan ay were attained Consols then quoted 89¾ ⅞, but had been done as low as 89¾. Although at the opening of the market on Tuesday, prices appeared firm at 89¾ ⅞ for Money, a sudden fall of ¼ per cent. rapidly succeeded, the closing quotation being 89 to ⅛. This sudden reaction was the effect of a rumour that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to send seven or eight millions of Exchequer Bills, and the arrival of news of the fall of prices of the Corn Laws from Paris, as well as the disturbed state of Parties in France An improvement of ¼ was, however, registered at the opening of the market on Wednesday, prices quoting better in Paris. Consols closed at 89⅞ ⅜. On Thursday the Market opened with some degree of firmness, and prices declined 89⅜ ⅞. These quotations, however, afterwards improved, and, although business was dull, the market was more buoyant. Exchequer Bills showed a downward tendency. Bank Stock was, however, firm at 200. In the Foreign Market, on Monday, prices were firmer, and Mexican improved to 19½ for Account. The Stock continued in some demand during Tuesday, but 19⅜ to ½ was the price marked. On Wednesday an improvement to 19⅝ was recorded, but the closing quotation is 19⅜ Prices generally, after Monday, became dull, and, although no extraordinary depression occurred, the following is the return of the prices last day's Dutch 2½, Ditto, New, 57; Chili, 1846, 1½; Peruvian Bonds, 6 per Cents., 35; Spanish, Five per Cent., 1840, 20¾; Ditto, Three per Cent., 32; Dutch, Two-and-a-Half per Cent. 54; Ditto, Four per Cent., Certificates, 89¾.

SOIREE OF THE WHITTINGTON CLUB.

THE WHITTINGTON CLUB.

On Tuesday, there was a soirée of the members of this Club, in their new location, late the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand. At seven o'clock, the President, Mr. Douglas Jerrold, took the chair, supported by Lord Dudley Stuart, M.P., Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Mr. George Thompson, M.P., Mr. Charles Lushington, M.P., Mr. Charles Knight, Mr. George Cruikshank, Mr. T. Landseer, Mrs. Percy Sinnett, Mrs. Cowden Clarke, and others of literature and political celebrity.

The President opened the proceedings by briefly congratulating the members upon their success, and by urging them to keep the grand object of their institution in mind—viz., the moral and intellectual advancement of all who belonged to it.

The company were then addressed by Mr. M. Milnes, Mr. C. Knight, Mr. G. Cruikshank, and Mr. G. Thompson; and the two latter gentlemen essayed "movere focum," with success.

A Concert followed; in which Mr. John Parry created infinite mirth with his imitations of "Miss Harriet and her governess." Miss Sabilla Novello sang a scena from "Der Freischutz;" and Miss Dolby warbled "Oh, tell me, pretty river." The whole entertainment gave great satisfaction to the company, upwards of 800 in number.

After the Concert, the room was cleared for dancing, to the music of Wenppert's band, which was continued until one o'clock, with much spirit.

The entertainments were given in the large ball-room, and refreshments were liberally served in the adjoining rooms. The réunion was, altogether, a very delightful scene; and more than one of the speakers congratulated the company upon the harmony of the occasion, in contrast with the olden appropriation of the room to purposes of a controversial and less satisfactory character. The Club already numbers upwards of 2000.

Expense of the Metropolitan Police Establishment. An account of the receipts and expenditure for the service of the Metropolitan Police in the year ended December 31, 1847, has been just published. The receipts on rate-warrants issued during the year is stated to have been £290,949, receipts from the Consolidated Fund, per Act 9 and 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 6, to defray the increased charge of the Metropolitan Police, arising from the addition of the duties of the Horse Patrol, Thames Police, &c., £23,552 9s. 6d. Total sum received from the parishes and the Treasury, respectively, during the year, £371,139 12s. 5d.; amounts received for special services of the police, £12,137; from public companies, private individuals, &c., £1707; theatres, &c., £629; amounts received for the conveyance of prisoners by vans, £1355; gross total of receipts during the year, £391,798 8s. The total sum paid for the service of the Metropolitan Police establishment during the year amounted to £373,208, and there was on hand, on January 1, 1848, a balance of £18,590. The receipts on account of the superannuation fund during the year were £8,982, and the payments on the same account, £8,980 1s. 11d. The fees, penalties, and fees levied at the under-mentioned police courts, and paid over by the respective clerks to the receiver, to be applied by him towards the expenses of the police-courts, are thus stated:—Bow-street, £672; Clerkenwell, £344; Marlborough-street, £1143; Greenwich and Woolwich, £625; Hammersmith and Wandsworth, £460; Lambeth, £991; Marylebone, £779; Southwark, £745; Thames, £761; Westminster, £951; Worshipstreet, £695. Total sum paid by the receiver to police-courts during the year 1847, £10,416.

A number of gentlemen in London have resolved to form themselves into a regiment, to be termed "The Queen's Own Volunteer Rifle Corps." The number at present proposed is 600; but probably it will be materially increased after it is fully known to the public. The parties who have taken the lead in this movement have received every encouragement from the Government, and will have their arms and ammunition supplied them. The uniform will be dark green, with black braiding, bronze ornaments, and a light cap. A commanding officer has been appointed and approved of, and the captains of companies and subalterns will be chosen by the gentlemen forming the corps.

The Irish Poor-Rate.—The Commissioners for Administering the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in Ireland have transmitted to the Secretary of State a statement, showing the progress of the collection of poor-rate in the several unions in Ireland during the month of December, 1847, and the financial condition of several of the unions at the close of the month. It appears that during the month there was collected £168,860; that the current expenses were £120,399, and that there remained at the close uncollected £890,539. The balances in favour of Boards of Guardians of 110 unions amounted to £145,796, while the balances against the remaining unions amounted to £8788. It also appeared that the net amount of debts on the 31st of December exceeded the sums in the treasurer's hands by £156,877. The statement thus exhibits an increased collection, a largely augmented expenditure, and a diminished amount of debt; while the total collected in the year (£970,318) exceeded the amount collected in 1846 by £580,247.

WHALE TAKEN OFF FOLKESTONE.

On Saturday last, a fine specimen of "the Fin Whale," measuring 50 feet in length, 30 feet in girth, and estimated to weigh 20 tons, was taken, dead, about five miles off Folkestone, by one of the fishing-boats of that place, and brought into the harbour. Here it was exhibited near the east pier; and, as no specimen of the whale had been captured on this part of the coast for upwards of forty years, the exhibition proved very attractive and profitable. The whale was seen and fired at, a few days since, by some Sandgate fishermen, and it is presumed to have died of the wounds then received, as it was quite dead when picked up. The fishermen sold the carcass, for fourteen pounds, to Mr. Marsh and three others, who must have realised a considerable sum by the exhibition.

On Wednesday, the Britannia steamboat, from Dover, began to tow the carcass from Folkestone, it is said, for exhibition in London; there to be added to the "sights of the season."

Fatal Effects of Chloroform.—A melancholy and fatal accident has just occurred in the city of Aberdeen from the habitual use of chloroform. The facts are these:—Soon after Professor Simpson's discovery was made known, Arthur Walker, a young man in the employ of Messrs. Souter and Shepherd, wholesale druggists, having occasionally to weigh out a portion of the chloroform, found himself so exhilarated under the effects of the vapour that escaped, that he was tempted to use it on his handkerchief as if it were Eau de Cologne, until a habit was formed which became a species of intoxication. His father, who was foreman on the establishment, on being made acquainted with these circumstances, endeavoured to dissuade the lad from such a pernicious practice, but without effect, and then it was soon observed that his nervous system began to give way. On Tuesday last he was left in the warehouse with a younger boy, and about mid-day, having to weigh an ounce of chloroform to order, could not resist the opportunity of inhaling a dose. Having got very excited, his companion was rather alarmed, and knowing that he got violent when any attempt was made to reprove him in such a state, he was pleased to see him lay his head quietly down on his arms, resting on the table. He was in this state when the principal clerk entered the warehouse, and, on his father being called, it was found as he lifted his head that life was gone. Medical assistance was speedily procured, but though the jugular vein in the neck was opened, no blood came. The deceased was in his 19th year.

A Rich Pauper.—A remarkable instance of propensity for hoarding has lately come to light, in the case of a woman who died last week in Macduff. The individual in question had been for years a pauper on the parish of King Edward, and her outward appearance at all times bespoke the deepest poverty. After her death, the person who had waited upon her in her illness found, rolled up in separate pieces of paper in a cupboard, 23 one-pound notes, six sovereigns, £7 in silver, mostly in half-crowns, besides a bank cheque for £50; the entire sum amounting to £86. The money has been paid over to the inspector of poor of King Edward's, that parish being entitled to it, to indemnify themselves for the sums they had paid to deceased.—Banffshire Journal.

THE INCOME-TAX AND THE BUDGET.

It is the perpetual destiny of Whig Governments to stumble over Finance. What is the cause is impossible to say; whether the traditions of Holland House and the days of Fox, are too slightly imbued with commercial knowledge for the present day, or that with great openness to conviction on all political and social questions—when settled by the people—there is a total incapacity in the party to deal with fiscal arithmetic, is hard to decide; but certain it is, Whig Ministries make a sad mess of all money matters. A balance sheet with the sum total on the right side of it, is with them an impossibility; in the plenitude of power, with all opponents disarmed, or even ranged on their side, they produce a Budget that turns all amity to wrath, unites against them the scattered forces of conflicting parties, and shakes them in their seats at the moment when in other respects they seemed most secure. The statement on Friday week was more unhappily put forth, and exhibited even less tact than their former dismal performances in this way. Lord J. Russell had a bad case; but he made it worse by his mode of handling it, which was so exceedingly unskilful that people are driven to the belief he meant for some purpose, to give as much offence as possible. If this was his intention, he perfectly succeeded. There has been nothing but discontent, misunderstandings, and explanations ever since. Even on the same evening Sir C. Wood had to define what the Premier did not mean; Lord Palmerston had to do the same. On Monday came more explanations, and a concession to the storm—the Estimates were to be turned over to a "Secret Committee." On Tuesday night, it was found that a "Select Committee" would do as well, and a Select Committee it is to be. But the miscalculation of public opinion, the indecision, and want of resource and foresight exhibited at every step, are lamentable. They were excused in 1841, because the party was weak; but now they break down on finance, when every division list shows a large majority; their checks are created by mismanagement that sets opinion against them.

The party, we repeat, are pursued by a financial fate; they are moderately successful in many things, well intentioned in most of their measures. Their evil destiny waits for the financial statement, and "all the demon makes his full descent" in that annual exposition of ways and means familiarly known as the "Budget."

So invariable is the failure, that a positive impression has been made on the public mind, of the impossibility of their success. A Whig Ministry, and a deficient revenue, are associated ideas; the accession of the party to office sends down the funds by a kind of anticipatory and sympathetic movement; people know what will happen. Whether their Chancellor of the Exchequer be a Wood or a Baring, he is always like Hood's "unlucky Joe," with whom nothing went right. And as that most unhappy of postboys at last grew reckless under continual calamity, and would as soon start on a journey with all the linch-pins out as in, seeing that no care he could take would prevent the disaster that was sure to occur, so the Whig financiers give up the struggle, never attempt to save money, never devise any but the old and worst ways of getting it, and press their bad scheme at the worst possible time, in the clumsiest manner, with a blindness little short of fatuity. If counselled to prudence and exertion, they might reply with the unfortunate Joe just cited, "what's the use of it to a man who was born on a Friday?" There is nothing for it but to let things have their course, sit still, and take the smash quietly. It will come; good years or bad, abundance or famine, it is all the same.

The House of Commons on Friday last was in a state that must have made the very hair of the Tadpoles and Tapers stand on end. Sir Robert Inglis, alone, had a word of approval to throw to the Ministry, like an alms; all else was bitterness. When the companions of Ulysses cut the bag which was the parting gift of Æolus, the uproar of the elements that ensued was but a type of the storm the opening the present Budget raised about the ears of the Government. There is yet another and more fatal analogy; the "bag tied with silver cord" was supposed to contain immense riches; but, alas! it proved nothing but wind! In short, it was a Whig Budget, presenting only a void and "deficiency."

The faults of the Whigs as financiers seem to be these; a want of courage to grapple in earnest with the amount of the expenditure and a too rigid adherence to routine, doing all that has ever been done before in the same manner, without enquiring whether the same efficiency might not be secured by a much less outlay: next, when a deficiency does occur, a total want of any resources or expedient for supplying it, except those already existing, which former Governments have already acted on; lastly, they have an unfortunate tendency to put their case in the worst shape at the worst opportunity.

Every one must remember the Budget of 1841, with its revision of the Timber and Sugar Duties. Their plan has since been carried out; but they proposed it when at their last gasp, as a party, after having neglected the proper policy when they were strong and prosperous. They were, doubtless, sincere; yet, from the time and manner in which they proposed the change, no one believed collar in their wisdom or sincerity, and they sunk under a large Conservative majority, covered with ridicule.

Is it not strange to see the same kind of mistake repeated in 1848, with all the experience of the interval to guide them? The same want of knowledge of men, and inability to suit the policy to the circumstances of the time. It surely required very little perception to judge that, though a deficiency exists, the present was not the juncture at which an addition could be made to the Income-Tax with impunity. But the Government only cast up the sum wanted, and turned a screw of two per cent. on to the Income-Tax to raise it. There is not the slightest attempt made at any expedient, or policy, or line of action. If any third clerk in the Treasury had been asked what he would do under the circumstances, he would have proposed just the very course. But is it to be tolerated in the Prime Minister of a great country, that he may be as barren of resource and action as a mere red-tapist—the small policy of an office desk? No. In a Minister is expected capacity of thought and intellect—some fertility of expedient—some policy—that, in short, which the world recognises as statesmanship.

The Government seem to have been misled by the facility with which Sir R. Peel imposed the Income-Tax at first, and afterwards prolonged its term. But what can be done at one time, can not be repeated with the same success at another. Peel accompanied the tax with large remissions of duties, and laid the foundation of a new and great commercial policy. It was a broad and comprehensive plan, promising results which would be worth the price; he followed it up when the experiment proved successful. The one step of totally abolishing the Excise on Glass was bolder than anything the Whigs ever dared attempt. It was followed by another measure bolder still—the abolition of the Corn Laws, which was the destruction not of a Statute or an Excise Act merely, but of a whole system. In all Peel's measures there was a broad view of the empire and its needs; a decision in the plan, and determination in carrying out, of his policy that commanded respect; and as it directed men's minds to the future, and opened new channels of activity, they cheerfully ratified his demand on their present resources as the price of future advantages, which are surely coming, and with them are slowly rising new power and influence for the man who pointed the way to them. The greatest of Peel's triumphs is yet to be, and the incapacity of the Whigs to deal with these questions is hastening it. Unaccompanied by any compensating measure, the Government merely works more rigidly the machinery devised by their predecessors. We want money, and we take it where it is most likely to be got—that is the whole extent of Ministerial invention.

Now, admitting that the deficiency, of more than three millions, must be made up, the circumstances of the time should have been considered before the above "stand and deliver" sort of method of doing so was resolved upon. A depression, left from the awful struggle of the past two years, still lags over all classes of society; that alone would make such an increase in the taxation of the Income-burdened section of the community most difficult to impose. But the proposal of an additional two per cent. was sure to work up the dissatisfaction of the public to the pitch of resistance. The gradual and insidious development of this tax, which places professional skill (the most uncertain of all possessions) on the same level as real property, which is the most solid, with its last step, became alarming. It was first proposed for three years: then another extension of time was added to it at the same amount: now we have an extension of time and an increase in the amount, both together; the promise, that the additional two per cent. shall cease in two years, leaving the impost at three per cent. for the remainder of this renewed lease, no one regards as worth a straw. All experience proves that this tax "is a kind of burr, and will stick once settled on us, there is no shaking it off. Before the two years are over, there will be sure some petty miserable war or other to be declared—or, that will turn us into a rebellion, and another "deficiency" will require the whole [illegible] per cent. to be made permanent. In fact, there is no disaster or pecuniary way for which two years of Whig government would not prepare us.

The instinctive feeling is the public that this will be the result, drives them to resist the increase now, on pain of being loaded with it for ever. The Government points to its expenditure: the nation replies, "Retrench!" and, what is more, is in just the temper to insist on its being done. The conduct of the Government since Lord [illegible]'s busily conceived speech, which left an impression exactly the reverse of what he possibly intended, shows irresolution and weakness always precursors of failure. The country is roused, the Income-tax is up; all shoes is heard on expression of contempt [illegible] sisters, who exhibit no more resource than parish overseers. All is just to be convinced that a deficiency of even more than three millions [illegible] must have been covered by a temporary resumption of some [illegible]s granted during the last thirty years, a loan on the [illegible] that tax, trusting the rest to the reaction that may naturally be expected after this period of depression, while the [illegible] could have been devoted to a real reduction of expenditure. It is that very alone the deficiency might have been met without [illegible] by our military and naval strength. If we only paid for it as force we required, placed where it was wanted, there need be no increase of taxation at all. But if the country permits a [illegible] to keep ten line-of-battle ships in a European port, to overawe a people and prop up a rotten Throne, while on the coasts of our empire, half-barbarous and always cruel, our countrymen are murdered by hundreds without one steamer to protect them, it must be prepared for a demand of three millions this year, and probably six millions next. Unless the people sternly and [illegible] this system of armaments, not for ourselves, but [illegible] Royalties of Europe, there will be no limit either to Income-Tax or to taxation. We have not discussed here the Income-Tax itself; that is a question long ago [illegible] overlooked for a necessity; but now [illegible] need not exist, does not exist, save to men who have [illegible] habituses that could remove it. The oppression, [illegible] once submitted to, is now universally resisted. There [illegible] assistance of the people and the press being so strongly [illegible] against any former tax. The Government [illegible] support their extravagant scheme. The [illegible] of modern dynasties, without exception, the want of [illegible] reduces a Government to the level of a parochial vestry [illegible] a rate. The younger journals, the reflectors of a yet wider circle of opinion, hold out no hope that the Government can take the industrious classes to support the tax by holding out the delusion [illegible] they are exempted from it. The London Telegraph puts [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE COURT OF ROME.—The report of the bill for establishing diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome was received, and the bill was ordered to be printed with amendments. Monday was fixed for the third reading.

IRELAND.—The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a bill to facilitate the sale of encumbered estates in Ireland. Lord STANLEY gave notice that he would on Thursday call attention to a newspaper published in Dublin, called the United Irishman, and which was of a rebellious and revolutionary character. On the motion of Lord MONTEAGLE, the Select Committee on the Encumbered Estates of Ireland was appointed. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. HORSMAN gave notice that, on going into Committee of Supply, on Monday next, he would submit a motion to the effect that the mode of assessing the Income-tax should be so altered as to render it more fair and equal in its operation.

Mr. B. OSBORNE gave notice that he would move, as an amendment to Sir R. Inglis's motion for a Committee on the new Houses of Parliament, an address to the Crown, praying for the appointment of a Royal Commission to superintend the votes granted by Parliament, so as to ensure the finishing of the new Houses as speedily as possible.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that, on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair to go into Committee of Ways and Means, on Monday next, he would move an instruction to the Committee to extend the probate and legacy duties to real property.

Sir R. HALL gave notice of his intention to move that the Income-tax be extended to Ireland.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, on moving the order of the day for going into a Committee of Supply, stated the course which the Government had resolved to take with reference to the estimates. He said, that seeing Mr. Hume's statement on the paper, to the effect that the estimates be postponed until after the decision of the House on the general financial scheme of the Government, he should feel bound to object to that amendment on constitutional grounds. It was the duty and practice of the House to determine first what should be supplied to her Majesty, and, after that, to consider by what ways and means the supply voted should be raised. It was absolutely necessary for the public service that some votes should be taken on account for the Navy and Army. On Monday next it would be his duty to state fully the reasons upon which the Government justified their general financial scheme. In the meantime, it was his intention to move for a Select or Secret Committee to inquire into the expenditure proposed for the Navy, the Army, and the Ordnance.

Mr. HUME denied that it was the duty of the House to vote supplies before looking at the Ways and Means. If the proposed Committee were to be a secret one, it would be unsatisfactory to the country. A Committee to revise the whole system of taxation would have been more desirable. He would not object to the Government taking a round sum, half a million or a million on account, until after the discussion on the budget.

Mr. DISRAELI was at a loss to understand what the real business of the House of Commons was, if every important matter was to be referred to a Select or Secret Committee. He warned the House to be cautious in thus delegating their proper functions.

Captain HARRIS thought he saw something like a compromise in this proposal for a Secret Committee.

Mr. HUME denied that he had any communication, verbally or written, with the Government on the subject.

The House went into Committee of Supply on the NAVY Estimates, and Mr. WARD, in moving the usual statement, moved for a vote of £235,000 for the naval excess of last year.

Mr. HERBERT and Mr. BANKES objected to the Secret Committee of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice.

Mr. HUME refused to consent to the specific vote asked, though he would consent to a sum of money on account of the general estimates.

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK declared that, in his opinion, it was wholly unconstitutional to propose a Secret Committee to inquire into the state of the Royal navy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had attempted to draw an analogy between the Select Committees from time to time appointed to inquire into the general finances of the country, and this proposed Committee to inquire into our naval and military forces. But there was the most material difference between the two inquiries; and unless the Prime Minister was prepared to assert, on his responsibility, that there were grave reasons of State, and that there was imminent peril, he (Lord G. Bentinck) would cordially support any Secret Committee. The Government was not fit to hold possession of office if they threw that responsibility which properly belonged to them upon a Secret Committee.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that, in 1791, in 1807, in 1817, and in 1828, under various Ministers Pitt, Grenville, Liverpool, and Wellington—the House had appointed Select Committees to inquire into the whole expenditure, including the army, navy, and ordnance. Those Committees not only select, but secret. There might be facts and evidence received by the proposed Committee that it might not be desirable to make public: and he was ready to state, on his responsibility, that he would be the last Minister to have the proposed Committee an open one. The Government did not wish to avoid responsibility; on the contrary, their proposal was, that, in addition to the inquiries of a Committee of the whole House, the estimates should be referred to a Secret Committee. The noble Lord emphatically declared that the estimates were not war estimates, nor framed with the view to a rupture of peace.

Mr. HERRIES did not think the precedents quoted by the noble Lord were applicable. They were all general financial committees, very different from a committee to inquire into the defences of the country.

Mr. HENLEY considered the proposal for a Select Committee as nothing less than the abdication of the functions of Government.

Sir R. PEEL said that, in 1828, he had moved for the last Committee to inquire into the military expenditure of the country. It was then decided that it should be a Select Committee, but not a secret one; that is, it published its reports, but had the power of excluding evidence, and it had suppressed evidence on military works, on the ground of "prudential motives."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER consented to withdraw the specific vote for £235,000 before the Committee. He gave notice that he would on Tuesday evening move for the proposed Secret Committee.

Mr. DISRAELI reminded Sir R. Peel that the Committee moved for by him in 1828 was not, as stated by him, to inquire into the military expenditure of the current year, but was a Committee to inquire into the general state of the public Income and expenditure. The honourable member advised the Chancellor of the Exchequer to furnish himself with precedents, on Tuesday evening, better than that furnished by Sir R. Peel.

Mr. WALLEY expressed his "astonishment, indignation, and disgust" at the Ministerial scheme of finance. He assured them that they would not be able to carry their proposed additional Income tax. John Bull would really be the dullest of beasts if he bore this new burden, and he (Mr. Walley) hoped that if endured quietly, the Income-tax would be doubled before the end of the year. No one was fool enough to suppose that the additional Income-tax would expire in two years. If once put on, it would be perpetual.

The specific vote was withdrawn, and votes on account, to the amount of £1,400,000 for the navy, and of £2,300,000 for the army, were agreed to.

The Committee on the JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL was postponed to Friday.

On the motion of Lord MORPETH, the PUBLIC HEALTH BILL was read a second time, and the Committee was fixed for the 6th of March.

EMIGRANT PASSENGERS' ACT.—Mr. LABOUCHERE moved the second reading of the bill for the better regulation of passengers to North America. The right hon. gentleman having referred to the dreadful mortality that occurred last year amongst the emigrants from Ireland—not less than seventeen per cent. —detailed the provisions of the bill, the principal of which were to allow twelve superficial feet for each passenger, to compel the captains to carry sufficient provisions, and to provide for the presence on board each vessel of a responsible Government officer to see justice done to the emigrants, and to take care that the regulations be fulfilled. The right hon. gentleman said that there was every probability that the emigration this spring would be equal to that of last year, and it was absolutely necessary for Parliament to pass some measure immediately, to prevent the disease and death which then characterised the emigration. Should the House assent to the second reading of the Bill, he proposed to refer it then to a Select Committee.

After a short discussion, the bill was read a second time.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.—On the motion of Mr. M. GIBSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee to consider a resolution, to be the foundation of a bill to enable joint-stock companies to wind up their affairs as between partners.

Some returns were ordered, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord DENMAN presented a petition from the Board of Council and the House of Assembly of the island of Antigua, on the subject of the Sugar Duties; and

The Earl of ABERDEEN called attention to the state of our squadron on the coast of Africa, which led to a short conversation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice, for the 7th of March, to move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the rights of ejected tenants.

Mr. M'GREGOR gave notice, for the 3d of March, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the management and regulations of the Customs; also, for the 7th of March, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the management of the naval docks of Great Britain and the British possessions.

EXPENSE OF THE NATIONAL ARMAMENT.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved for two Select Committees—one to inquire into the expenditure of the Navy, Army, and Ordnance; the other to inquire into the miscellaneous expenditure. The right hon. gentleman said it had been usual to appoint such committees to examine into the income and expenditure of the country, and it had been a question with the present Government, shortly after coming into office, whether such a committee was not desirable, seeing that from the year 1835 to 1847 the naval, military, and ordnance expenditure had, increased from £21,700,000 to £17,300,000. The Government thought this great increase a subject fit for inquiry, but at the beginning of the session they were of opinion that, in consequence of the unusual number of committees already appointed, it would be unwise to propose another committee. But though they felt this objection, yet, seeing that much misconception prevailed with respect to the expenditure that had been found necessary, they had come to the conclusion that they must submit to the inconvenience of now appointing these Committees. There was no exact precedent to be found for the Committee to inquire into expenditure of the Navy, Army, and Ordnance, which he was about to move for, but he did not think it necessary on all occasions to act strictly according to precedent. He had been under a mistake, when, on the preceding evening, he asserted that all the former Committees had been secret. He now found that, though they had the power of excluding such evidence as they thought not desirable to publish, they were not secret. He admitted he was wrong at first, and his proposal now was that the two Committees should be select, but not secret.

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK said that he was in a great measure relieved from the opposition he intended to make to the Committee, since the right hon. gentleman had changed the intention of making it secret. He understood, on Monday night, that the Government were about to abolish their sinecures as servants of the Crown; but now that the first proposed Secret Committee had dwindled down into a jumble of two Committees, that were to be open, the grave objections that applied to the Secret Committee were diminished. He presumed that the Government did not seek to relieve themselves from the responsibility that attached constitutionally to them, of the increased expenditure for the defences of the country, and the strength of our naval and military forces; and he trusted that the question of the necessity of the increased fortifications and armaments would not be made the subject of inquiry for the proposed Committee. Making a protest against the majority encroaching on the proper functions of the Executive Government and the prerogatives of the Crown, he would not offer any objection to the select Committee.

Mr. DISRAELI maintained that there was no precedent for the proposed Committee, which was neither more nor less than a shifting of the responsibility of the Government on a Select Committee. He deprecated the practice of delegating to Select Committees questions which legitimately belonged to the House. He would not, of course, oppose the motion made by the Government. Happy must whose very blunders only proved the anxiety of their opponents to support them. The hon. member, however, could not avoid protesting against the proposed Secret Committee, which was unauthorised by the practice of Parliament, and would little conduce to the dignity of the Government.

Sir R. PEEL would not oppose the appointment of a Select Committee, though he was himself ready to give his assent to the estimates submitted on the responsibility of the Government; and though he felt satisfied that the practice of a Select Committee could properly decide the amount of force that the public exigencies of the country required. For his own part, so far from thinking that the estimates proposed by the Government were excessive, he was sparingly satisfied at finding that they were so moderate; and he rejoiced that the Government had not patiently taken of that panic which prevailed a short time ago relative to the defences of the country.

Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Hume, Mr. Bright, and Colonel Sibthorp, addressed a few remarks to the House.

Lord J. RUSSELL justified the proposed Committee, and defended the small increase that had been made in our armaments, an increase not made in consequence of any apprehension of a rupture of peace. It was necessary that the British Government should afford the usual protection to its subjects in the colonies and in foreign countries, and that could not be afforded without considerable naval and military power. The Kaffir war was attended with great expense, and it might be a question for the Committee whether the whole of this should fall on the mother country. He assured the House that he would not himself perfectly free to pass his opinion upon the estimates, and to vote, should he think fit, for their reduction. There was not a despotic Government in Europe that would dare to propose additional taxation upon a community so miserably suffering as ours.

Mr. Buck, Mr. Bankes, Sir R. Inglis, Captain Harris, Mr. Slaney, and Mr. Villiers made some remarks, and the two Select Committees moved for by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were appointed.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. HUTT moved for a Select Committee to consider the best means which Great Britain can adopt for mitigating the horrors of the slave trade, and providing for its final extinction. In the course of his speech, he contended that it was useless continuing to endeavour to put down the slave trade by force. So far from that abominable trade having been lessened since the establishment of our squadron on the coast of Africa, it had been more than doubled, with aggravated cruelty: and it would go on increasing so as the profits realised by this trade were often £2000 per cent. The United States Government was the only one that really co-operated with us; for, as to the French fleet, it might as well be cruising in the British Channel as on the coast of Africa, for all the good it did there. In Cuba and Brazil, immense fortunes were making by this nefarious traffic, and many of the men were engaged in it, thus giving the world the idea that, however we might have the word humanity on our lips, we allowed our humanity to stand in the way of our money-making. The frightful loss of life on the west coast of Africa, was itself sufficient to convince the House of the necessity of considering the question whether our squadron should not be withdrawn. He was not able to obtain precise information as to the annual number of slaves the slave trade to itself.

Mr. ADDERLEY, in a maiden speech, seconded the motion. If our squadrons were withdrawn, free labourers to any required number could be obtained for the West India Islands at the cost of £4 10s.; and when the Brazilians would learn that they could get free labourers at a trifling cost, they would not pay £100 per slave to the slave-traders.

Sir R. INGLIS admitted with pain that all our efforts to put a termination to the slave trade had only aggravated the evils; but, at all events, we were right in what we had done, in casting from us the crime of inactivity. He did not see why ought to persist in those sacrifices and exertions which had for their object the suppression of the slave trade, if we did not oppose the motion.

Mr. CARDWELL supported the Committee, and argued that legitimate commerce was the only way to supplant the slave trade.

Lord PALMERSTON had no objection to the motion. He agreed that it was fitting an inquiry should take place, though he did not admit all the statements made. The efforts made by this country had been attended with considerable success. The extraordinary price paid for slaves was in fact proof that the supply was not equal to the demand, and consequently, the trade was very much suppressed. He was ready to admit that a maritime police alone was inequal to put down the slave trade; but he denied that it had aggravated the evils, or that it was the cause of complaint with other countries. He agreed that legitimate commerce was the best remedy for the slave trade; but if the squadron were withdrawn and the system of prevention broken up, the legitimate trader would be driven from the coast of Africa by the slavers and pirates which would then swarm along it. Treaties made with barbarous chiefs had done much, and it was the object of the two Governments of France and England to multiply those treaties: and they hoped to enclose the whole coast of Africa by those treaties, and thus put an end to the slave trade. He trusted, however, at all events, that Parliament would not reverse the policy heretofore pursued by this country in respect to this detestable crime of slavery.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the right hon. gentleman would be told that while the squadron on the coast of Africa had only captured between 2000 and 3000 a year during the last four years, not less than 60,000 slaves were imported into Brazil in one year; and when they learned, as certainly that expenditure of £700,000 a year only effected the rescue of one out of every twenty slaves, they would come to a conclusion that on every ground, including that of humanity, an end should be put to our present system of so-called protection.

After some observations from Captain Pechell, Lord Claude Hamilton, Lord Jocelyn, and Mr. Ward, the Committee was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to 6 o'clock.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY.—THE "MONSTER MOTION."

Mr. ANSTEY, who had on a former occasion been "counted out," resumed his motion on the foreign policy of this country, and the conduct of successive administrations of which his Lordship was a member. The honourable gentleman occupied nearly five hours in the delivery of his speech. He proceeded to find fault with the Government policy with regard to Poland, which he described as an unworthy truckling to Russia, and as a sacrifice of Poland—with his policy with regard to Italy, which he had surrendered, bound hand and foot, into the hands of Austria—with his policy with regard to Spain, which he had destroyed the independence by preventing a British diplomatic agent from holding communication—with his policy with regard to Turkey, from whose weakness Russia had derived aggrandisement by his constant cause in the treaty of Adrianople—with his policy with regard to Egypt, Mehemet Ali, and the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi—with regard to his treatment of Mr. Urquhart, whose talents as a diplomatist he overwhelmed with the most disproportionate eulogy—with his treachery towards Circassia—with his apathy, as an English Minister, upon the seizure by the Russians of Mr. Bell's English schooner the Vixen—and with various other acts of omission and commission, by which he had transferred to Russia the dominions of independent princes and nations. He also charged the noble Lord with having made, on all these various subjects, false statements to Parliament and to his Sovereign, and with having incurred thereby the guilt of high treason. He then proceeded to attack Colonel Dunlop, who had been the intimate friend of the noble Lord, and had published a work entitled *Despatches of the Ambassadors sent to Minsk, and Mr. Lonblanque, the brother of the late editor of the Examiner, and now consul in Servia, in the most severe and abusive terms, as mere tools and agents of Lord Palmerston. He then justified the conduct of the French, and condemned the conduct of the English Government towards Turkey in 1840, stating that our conduct must have been different if it had not been dictated by Lord Palmerston, and accusing that noble Lord of having betrayed therein the interests of his country. He likewise attacked the policy pursued by Lord Palmerston in the Spanish marriages, defending the conduct of Louis Philippe, and arraigning that of the British Cabinet. He charged Lord Palmerston with having in the case of the Spanish marriages when his purpose was to establish a ground of discord with France, taken his ground upon the treaty of Utrecht with the full knowledge that every one of the altered was false. Lord J. Russell had expressed his hope that other and more friendly relations might still subsist between this country and France, and that peace should be preserved between this country and all other countries. But he was certain that the country was still labouring from the effects of the bitterness and bitterness which the conduct of Lord Palmerston was calculated to produce, and which, in effect, it had produced. He then proceeded to attack the conduct of his Lordship, in reference to transactions in Persia and Afghanistan, and by assuming him of having committed forgeries for the purpose of misleading Parliament as to the intentions and dispositions of the Afghans. He likewise charged Lord Palmerston with having involved Malta in war with the United States for the purpose of adding one more slaveholding state. Texas, to the number of those already opposing the whole of the Union in co-operation with the designs of the northern states against British North America. He then attacked his Lordship's slave-trade treaties, and contended that by their means he had interrupted our friendly relations with nearly every civilised nation in the world. These were not all the charges which he had to bring against the noble Lord; but he had suppressed—hush, he had not withdrawn—many of them out of respect to the decision of the Speaker, who had on more or two occasions interfered to check his calumnious discursiveness. If he failed in his ability to prove them, he was ready to submit to the heaviest censure of the House.

Mr. ANSTEY, in one of his happiest efforts, replied to Mr. Anstey. He had intended to prove that Lord Palmerston had always performed the part which it became an English Minister to enact—that with great abilities he had combined a thorough knowledge of the political and commercial interests of the country, and those moral attributes which characterize the great nation whose cause was entrusted to him—that he had always been high minded, straightforward, and true—that the honour of England had remained unsullied in his care—and that he had been the champion of humanity, the promoter of civilization, and the director of constitutional and well ordered freedom in every country of the world. But fulsome adulation was only less odious than the rabid and unfounded vituperation in the indulgence of which the foulness of tongue and the dullness of understanding or the vitiation of the heart. He had, however, cleared his Right Hon. friend from Mr. Anstey's calumnies again and again all the accusers of the house of Commons, until the Speaker himself was compelled, for the purpose, not for the protection of Lord Palmerston, but for the rescue of the House from the indignities with which they were cast upon it. The House, however, was impatient to hear Mr. Urquhart; for he was not only the silent but the only witness of Mr. Anstey all the rest were dead. Let them, Mr. Urquhart get up at once and give such evidence. If he should distinctly and unequivocally specify facts, the House would listen to him, but if he should indulge in vague and indefinite assertion, the House would come to a conclusion as to the motives of the two hon. members very different from that which they wished the House of Commons to arrive.

Mr. URQUHART contended that until an answer was given to the elaborate extraordinary statement of Mr. C. Anstey, it would be unnecessary to form a fresh evidence against Lord Palmerston. He then entered into a statement of personal to himself, in which the public had but little interest. He declared all hostility against Lord Palmerston, but he was convinced that from first to last his Lordship had been serving the interests of the bitterest foe to England namely, Russia. He threw the House into convulsions of laughter by declaring that whatever vote it might come to on the charges preferred by Mr. Anstey, it never could restore Lord Palmerston to the position in which he had stood previous to that morning. He denied that he was either a visionary or a madman in the charges which he had himself been compelled to bring against this noble personage. He pledged himself to prove, if the House would but grant him a Committee, that Lord Palmerston had frustrated the opportunities which had been offered to him of entering into commercial relations with the principal states of the world most favourable to this country. The investigation of the charges brought by Mr. Anstey and himself against Lord Palmerston was absolutely necessary for the honour of the House, the country, and the crown.

Viscount PALMERSTON observed, that in what he had to say he would avoid the use of language which was only disgraceful to those who used it, which was at variance with the rules of the House, with the courtesies of society, and with the practice of gentlemen. But he would repel in terms the most comprehensive, in language the most positive and complete, the charges of every kind and description, which Mr. Anstey and Mr. Urquhart had brought and asserted in that House. If the question were one between himself and "these two members," he doubted whether he would vouchsafe even to contradict or disprove their assertions; but he owed it to the House and to the country to do so as publicly as the charges had been made. If it should be the pleasure of the House to institute an inquiry into the whole of his public conduct, he was not a document in the records of the Foreign office, not a private or confidential letter in his own possession, which he would not readily, and with pride, submit to the scrutiny and judgment even of his political opponents. Having said this much with regard to the subject generally, the noble lord proceeded to notice some of the charges contained in the speech of Mr. Anstey, which, in his opinion resembled more "the images of a kaleidoscope of order, that appear and vanish before presented to human vision." Amongst other things with which he was charged, was that of having in 1834 made a treaty with Russia. The result of this treachery on his part was obvious, in the fact that England was now a province of Russia—that Russia was predominant in the councils of this country, and, through this country, in the affairs of the world. The first ground upon which this charge was based was, that he had been complimented, some years ago, by the Russian ambassador in a despatch to his Government, as having "made a good speech." He could conceive the honourable and learned gentleman, on that ground at least, his loyalty would never be called in question. The noble lord was proceeding to notice other points of the charge, when, six o'clock having arrived, the Speaker declared the House adjourned, intimating that the debate would stand as an order of the day on Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE "UNITED IRISHMAN" NEWSPAPER.—Lord STANLEY proceeded to call their Lordships' attention to the violent language held in a newspaper published in the first number of this journal, which, had lately been established in Dublin. He wished to know if the attention of the Law Officers of the Crown had been called to the subject, and if it was their intention to take any proceedings? The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that his attention and that of Lord Chancellor had been called to the newspaper in question. (Hear, hear.) It would not be only his duty, but that of the Government, to take such steps as was confident that he would not be the circumstances of the case might seem to him to require. He was not, however, authorised to say that he had felt it his duty to institute a prosecution against the parties. The subject then dropped.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.—The LORD CHANCELLOR then moved the second reading of this bill, and entered briefly into its details. It would not, he said, to be of the utmost advantage to Ireland, where an land was deeply mortgaged. This, in fact, was one of the most fruitful sources of the impoverished condition of the country. The object of the bill was to enable the proprietors of encumbered estates, heavily encumbered, to dispose of them. It, he should say, would lead to the better management of the estates, and to the profitable cultivation of the land. A short discussion ensued, after which the bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed that day fortnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Lord R. GROSVENOR presented the report of the Committee on the election for the County of Pembroke, declaring Mr. Forbes Mackenzie duly elected.

On the motion of Mr. DENDES, Mr. Dan O'Connell's warrant to issue for the Lancaster election case, was committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, for prevarication in his evidence.

WINDOW-TAX.—Lord DUNCAN brought forward his motion for the repeal of the Window-tax. He repeated all the arguments against this impost, dwelling especially on the sanitary bearings of the question. The motion was opposed by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and, after some discussion, negatived on a division by a majority of 99, the numbers being—for, 68; against, 167.

Mr. BRIGHT obtained leave to bring in a Bill on the Game Laws.—A Bill for altering the Law of Copyright in Scotland was read a first time.—The House journed at half-past twelve o'clock.

The Excellency Sir Stratford Canning leaves town this week, accompanied by Lady Canning, and their children, for Constantinople, to resume his diplomatic functions as Ambassador to the Sublime Porte. Lord Cowley returns to Paris within a month after the arrival of Sir Stratford.

FATHER RICCIOTTI, Mr Hayward, Lord Clerk of Trinity Church, Brighton, has lately presented a cover for the font: it is in the decorated style of architecture, emapled, and carved in oak: put together without any nails or metal of any kind. Mr. Hayward is but an amateur artist, and, owing to the loss of the use of his right shoulder, the whole of the above work has been executed with his left hand; and it is a highly creditable performance.

SOYER'S PARISCHAL MOBILE KITCHEN.—This kitchen has been opened in Spitalfields, where 10,000 poor reside, with a very small number of wealthy neighbours to assist them. Mr. Soyer was so impressed with this melancholy fact that he conceived one of his model kitchens to be the best thing for the above district, and from it will be distributed beef-soup, peas pandas, and rice curry, at the rate of a quart for one penny, with a quarter of a pound of bread. It is proposed to limit the quantity of this distribution by public newspaper, to be announced or monthly, showing the cost, ingredients consumed, and number of persons relieved. We hope this philanthropic plan will succeed; for, judicious economy and charitable dispensation, may effect wonders in the relief of public distress.

EXTRAORDINARY EXPRESS FROM LONDON TO EDINBURGH AND LONDON.—One of the most extraordinary railway achievements in England was performed on Saturday last, on the London and North-western and York, Newcastle and Berwick, and East Coast lines from London to Glasgow. This express, which was arranged by Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son, newsvenders, Strand, left London at 35 minutes past five o'clock in the morning, with the newspapers of the day, containing Lord J. Russell's financial statement, and the debates in Parliament of the preceding evening, and reached Edinburgh at nine-seven minutes past three in the afternoon, completing the 1(2) miles in ten hours and twenty-two minutes. The celerity of fifty minutes, including eight minutes occupied in passing from station to station, and seven minutes in passing from Tweedmouth to the station at Berwick, thus reducing the actual railway travelling to nine hours and thirty-two minutes, being at the rate of fifty miles an hour! Not the slightest circumstance connected with this express is, that it arrived at Edinburgh at one hour and a half, and in Glasgow two hours before the mails which left London the previous day. The express on the London and North-western went through to Liverpool and also to Manchester, and was worked in an equally efficient manner by that company. The total number of miles run by Messrs. Smith's expresses on that day was 665½.

GRAND BALL AT THE JARDIN D'HIVER, AT PARIS, IN AID OF THE BRITISH CHARITABLE FUND.—THE PROMENADE.

GRAND BALL AT PARIS.

YESTERDAY week, a magnificent entertainment took place, at the Jardin d'Hiver, in the Champs Elysées, in aid of the British Charitable Fund. The patron was his Excellency the British Ambassador, the Marquis of Normanby. Lady Patronesses: the Marchioness of Normanby; the Countess of Essex; the Countess of Sandwich; Lady Augusta Wentworth; Lady Augusta Gordon Hallyburton; Lady William Hervey; Lady Maria Sanderson; Lady Gray of Gray; the Dowager Lady Kilmaine; Lady Poltimore; the Hon. Mrs. Edmund Knox; Mrs. Courtenay Boyle; Mrs. Tudor; Mrs. Gerard Gould; and Mrs. Olliffe. Stewards: the Marquis of Huntley; the Marquis of Hertford; Lord William Hervey; Lord F. Gordon Hallyburton; Viscount Wellesley; Lord Poltimore; Admiral the Hon. E Knox; Thomas Pickford, Esq.; Colonel Fletcher; George Tudor, Esq.; John Gunning, Esq.; Thomas Lawson, Esq.; and Dr. Shrimpton. Chairman of the Committee of Management: Lord Gray of Gray.

The company consisted of upwards of 1000 of the élite of Paris society; and although, as might have been expected, the number of English preponderated, there was a considerably larger number of French and foreigners present than on former years.

The Ball took place in the beautiful hall attached to the Jardin, and the Jardin itself, in which refreshments were laid out, was thrown open as a promenade. At the end of the garden there was displayed for a short time, an artificial red light, which had a superb effe

The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, accompanied by the other Lady Patronesses and by the Stewards, entered about half-past ten o'clock. They were received by the whole of the company standing, and on their entry the band (Strauss') struck up the national anthem. Dancing immediately commenced, and was continued without intermission till past four o'clock. The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby did not leave the ball-room till past one o'clock.

We are glad to learn that, notwithstanding the [illegible] with which the Ball was conducted, there will be a [illegible]ble surplus for the benefit of the charity—nearly £400 it is said. The arrangements of the committee of management were in every respect excellent, and gave universal satisfaction. Among the distinguished foreigners present were the Prince of Syracuse and the Turkish Ambassador.

His Excellency Lord Howard De Walden, the British Minister at the Court of Belgium, arrived in London on Thursday night, from Brussels, on a short leave of absence.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

(Concluded from page 104.)

In the South Room we have No. 323, "The New Boy." T. H. Maguire

"I think I know it now, please Sir."

The public have hitherto known this artist but as an accomplished lithographer, who is celebrated for his portraits on stone; but here we have painting of no mean order, combining great force of chiaro-scuro with much truth of expression. It is the misfortune of lithography in England to be considered but as a stepping stone to something beyond by many of those whose education has most fitted them for the work.

337. "Osborne House, the Marine Residence of her Majesty." J. W. Carmichael. We like the land of this better than the water; the waves are something too compact, and have the appearance of having sat for their pictures.

338. "Cowley Spring, a Water-cress Bed, near High Wycombe." E. J. Niemann. A very nice picture, rich in sunshine, and very successfully treated as regards atmospheric truth. A little more of detail in foreground would have given to it a higher rank in art.

345. "Saxon Alms-giving." W. B. Scott. One of the Cartoons made for the Art-Union competition, painted as a picture. This is an example of ambition in the artist that is not justified by the result. He has much to learn.

349. "Francesca of Rimini." J. Harwood. There is some reality about this picture, but it wants elevation to become poetic.

354. "Interior of a Walnut-oil Mill, Poitiers." E. A. Goodall. A bit of machinery that would aptly illustrate the Mechanics' Magazine.

355. "Willie's Return." Burns. Alex. Johnston. This picture is very well painted, nicely composed, with a pleasantness of tone that is almost harmony in colour: but it is something injured by the manner in which the head of the Highlander is placed on his shoulders. The old woman in the room beyond is very satisfactory.

358. "The Cabin Hearth." A. D. Fripp. Can our Irish artists tell nothing of their country but its dirt and dulness? This may be all true, but it is scarcely pleasing enough to be picturesque.

366. "Emmet of the Irish Minstrel." W. Essex. A successful reproduction of the Lawrence portrait of T. Moore, Esq.

367. "A Shepherd Watching his Flock Moonlight." A. Gilbert. One of those powerfully affective sketches in which this artist is so happy. Mr Gilbert is one of the very few that justify the bravura style in painting by their works.

371. "Pan Teaching Apollo." H. Le Jeune. A masculine production, showing great power in drawing. We would, however, object to a deficiency of chest in the youth compared with his limbs.

377. "View on the Severn, with Cattle." E. Willis. If it were not for a little hardness in the sky this would be a very nice picture, in spite of some affectation of the Paul Potter touch in grass and foreground. Nature is a better model than even Paul Potter.

379. "Reapers." J. Harris. There is drawing in this picture; but there is an endeavour at refinement in the heads that is not appropriate to the subject. We also object to a pervading browniness in tone, consequent, we suppose, to the too free use of asphaltum as a ground to paint into. The picture has, nevertheless, many good qualities.

389. "The Rock and Royal Castle of Dumbarton, on the Clyde." E. W. Cooke. A very fine picture indeed, of large dimensions. The subject interesting; the water full of motion, and the execution generally powerful, and broad in effect.

390. "Reverie." W. Fisher. A young lady seated at the step of a hall door, and contemplating the foot prints of a horse in the sand. A very nice picture.

398. "Palace of Ogni Anna. Capri in the distance—Bay of Naples." W. Linton. This is a more powerful picture than we have lately seen by this artist. Its colour is harmonious, and it is treated, as to finish, so as to be perfectly satisfactory at its point of view. We like this picture much.

"THE LILY OF ST. LEONARD'S."—PAINTED BY J. PHILLIP.

395. "Suspense." T. F. Dicksee. A courtship, of course; and in the green wood. The female figure is gracefully drawn, but the composition is much injured by the consecutiveness of line repeated by the lover at her side. It is also something too sharp in general manipulation.

400. "King Lear, Kent, Edgar, and Mad Tom, in the Storm." R. F. Abraham. There is a good deal of intention in these heads, and in those of Lear and Edgar, intention almost accomplished; but the draperies are unreal and careless in study, the feet and legs ill drawn, and the composition confused.

402. "East Cliffs, Hastings." J. Danby. A clever effect of sunrise; but these evanescent effects belong to a class of art in which a painter cannot calculate upon permanence of reputation, for such a picture, if it is right at present, cannot survive the changes time will make upon its delicacy of hue.

413. "Scene at the Entrance of Burlington Harbour." Copley Fielding. A fresh breeze at sea, very beautifully painted, and equal to the artist's best water-colour specimens, which it very much resembles.

414. "Precious Moments." J. J. Jenkins. Another example of oil painting by a water-colour artist, who has succeeded in transferring his best characteristics to a more permanent material. This is a very nice picture of a courtship between a brace of Bretons, richly composed as to colour and powerfully painted. A little more of truth in texture bestowed upon the carnations would be desirable.

418. "St. Mark, from the Sea—Fishing-boats." C. Bentley. This is a very fine picture. The water beautifully limpid, and wild with motion; all being illuminated with the brightest daylight.

419. "View of Snowdon, seen over Capel Curig, Caernarvonshire." Copley Fielding. This is far too prismatic in its effects for an oil painting. The mannerism of the artist, that tolerated in water colour, will not bear translation.

424. "Chiozza, an Island Town near the mouths of the Po, south of Venice." W. Linton. The water very successfully treated, but the buildings so little cared for as to look false at the distance where the rest looks true.

428. "Dragoons of the 17th Century." W. and H. Barraud. The chiaro-oscuro and harmony of colour in this picture are well managed.

435. "Falls of the River Ogwen," North Wales. F. R. Lee, R.A. This is by no means a successful attempt in something of a new department to the artist. There is a flatness of perspective, and a deficiency of character in the detail, of these lumps of rock, that does not satisfy the spectator.

440. "The Wounded Hound." R. Ansdell. A very fine picture of its class; well painted throughout. A magnificent Bloodhound suffering from accident is having his wound dressed by an aged attendant of the Kennel, who is accompanied by a child. Another dog seems to moan loudly for the misfortune of his companion. The sentiment of gratefulness with which the wounded animal regards his surgeon would not bear carrying further.

445. "Modane in Savoy." W. Oliver. The clouds do here so imitate the character of the distant hills, that it is difficult to decide where the sky begins. This may be sometimes true, but it is not, therefore, picturesque.

448. "Dorothea." T. Creswick, A.R.A. Here we have a stony reality; one might geologize upon these fragments of a ruined world. We cannot, however, admire Dorothea, who does no other service to the picture than give it a name.

453. "On the Medway," near Gillingham. W. A. Knell. This is a clever picture of its class.

The Sculpture is not remarkable for excellence beyond 461, "Sabrina." W. Calder Marshall, A.R.A.; which is very nice in expressed sentiment, and graceful in composition.

462. "Playmates." J. Lawlor. A child and dog. The child something affected in composition; so as to resemble a fat man. Is there not a statue of Handel very like it?

463. "The Morning Ablution." T. Earle. Clever, but confused in line, and the two arms of the child unpleasantly consecutive.

We may by some be considered to have given more of our space to this Exhibition than the quality of art it contains can justify; for it is reproached with presenting less than its average of excellence. This reproach is just rather in respect to a deficiency of leading pictures than to a general deterioration in the mass. It is quite true that there are not so many names of established fame in the catalogue; but that some half-dozen painters have omitted to send their works, is not a proof that those exhibited are unworthy notice. It is an easy task for the critic to expatiate upon the painting of Edwin Landseer and the colouring of Etty, or to indulge in all the common-place of vituperation against the eccentricities of Turner; but to discover new talent, and describe the progress of those still struggling for notoriety, is far more serviceable to the cause of Art. That certain painters do not now, as formerly, exhibit here, arises partly from that change in the regulations that refuses works which have been before exhibited, and partly from a growing rivalry among Exhibitions that causes each to look more carefully to its own attractions. That there are but few leading pictures at the British Institution may, therefore, be received as an indication that the Royal Academy will be the richer by their presence, and that the Suffolk-street painters are exerting themselves to provide a respectable excuse for the charter that has been granted to them. The Free Exhibition also, it is likely, will present something more worthy of public attention than its exploits gone by. In spite of carpers, Art is progressing rapidly among us, and pictures are every year produced that will immortalize their painters. The country possesses numerous specimens in which the manipulatory excellence of the work will vie with anything of any time, while that sentimental delicacy of expression that describes the thought with exactness is not confined to solitary examples. Brilliancy and harmony of colour have become our undisputed characteristics, and there are none any where else who treat the carnations so successfully as many we could name in Great Britain. There is, we know, a class of critics who affect to despise all this, and who indulge in a shallow, declamatory, glorification of historic art, as that only by which fame may be a permanence. These persons would have us believe that the mind of man is only to be truly illustrated by the painter when depicting the actions of a barbarous people, or embodying th inventions of a classic poet. They are, however, not of those who buy pictures, for we hear but little of commissions for such works, and the example set by the Fine Arts Committee, of using the proceeds of the Westminster Hall Exhibition for the purpose of purchasing some of the paintings, has not been very encouraging to their speculative production. That painters will rather be guided by the opinions of those who love art enough to pay for it, rather than by the dogmas of mere theorists, the character of the present Exhibition is an evidence.

We have this week engraved Mr. Phillips' very pleasing picture of "The Lily of St. Leonard's," already commended in our Journal of the 12th inst., for nice detail and bright and clear effect.

The second Illustration is Mr. Sidney Cooper's "Cattle Reposing," one of the master-pieces, if not the finest picture in the Exhibition. Its sunlit tone and beautiful finish are very striking, and remind one of the finest works of Cuyp and Paul Potter.

We shall return to this collection for the sake of engraving two or three more of the most meritorious pictures.

THE INSURRECTION IN PARIS.

We have received, and are expecting, from our Artist in Paris, a variety of Sketches of the most interesting description, which we shall have carefully and beautifully Engraved for Next Week's ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

February 24th, 1848.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1848.

THE events of the week in Paris have proved to Louis Philippe, that, spite of his enormous army, the forts, the limited franchise and unlimited power of buying the electors, spite of his strong majority in the Chambers, there is still something that can check "the system." He is as nearly absolute as a King can be, who exists by a charter, and professes to govern by a Constitution, though both are mockeries. A revolt in Paris must always make him feel that as he was raised to the Royal power so he may be hurled from it. And though through eighteen years he has crushed the populace as a mass, and escaped the vengeance that worked by the hand of the assassin, yet he is now in extreme old age, with a child for his successor, sitting on a throne that trembles on the wave of popular convulsion! One would think that the sagacity and wisdom which have brought him only to this, cannot be of the highest order.

The movement which has revived in the streets of Paris the charges and barricades of the "three days," has had at present for its chief result—a change of Ministry; M. Guizot cedes his place to M. Molé, and then of course the usual subordinate changes. This is certainly an unfortunate consequence of a policy of strong measures, firm attitudes, and what is called vigour; a Ministry appeals to force to carry on its policy of suppression, and overwhelming as that force is, physically considered, the step destroys the Government. That M. Guizot should fall is not surprising; his unpopularity has gone on increasing for the last two years—in the last few months with great velocity. The prohibition of the Reform Banquet was only the last act of a long series equally, even more, arbitrary. The Foreign policy of the Government was Anti-National; France was reverting to the principles and alliance of Austria and Russia, when it departed at all from what M. Guizot called a "politique d'isolement," which he recommended to France in 1840. That this could be applied by the bulk of the French people, is impossible; but, constituted as the French Chambers are, filled with men employed by the Government, or hoping to be employed, the opinion of the public is not reflected there. Hence the necessity of a revolt; a tumult in the streets; barricades and bloodshed, even to secure so small, and, as far as the nation is concerned, unimportant result, as the change of M. Guizot for M. Molé.

We call it unimportant, for that it will be followed by any real change in the system that crushes the people of France under its profligate and corrupt bureaucracy, we do not believe. Louis Philippe merely plays an old game over again. If a Ministry becomes, by carrying out his policy, unpopular to the degree that makes them useless as tools, the King dismisses them. In the present case, the popular feeling was deeper than he expected, the military force could not be safely engaged in, even with 100,000 men; so there was a little forbearance of shooting and sabreing, and—a dismissal of the Ministry. The one that succeeds it is merely one of those temporary Governments of which Louis Philippe has made so many, to break them up the moment the crisis has passed.

Molé has been as often the colleague of M. Guizot as opposed to him; others of the new Ministry are supporters of the "dynasty;" the one or two extreme liberals who are brought in as blinds, to cheat the excitement of the hour, as the people were duped through Lafayette in the last revolution, will be got rid of as soon as the present fever subsides. Change of policy, Reform, increase of liberty there will be none; the principal value of the present movement is, that it shows the King the limits of what he can attempt by force. Had he dared to give the word to "mow down in masses," like Charles X., he would have done it. But his prudence only makes his despotism safer; with M. Molé for his Minister, reform is as far off as ever.

NEW COLONIAL SEALS.

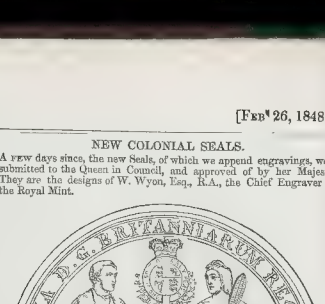
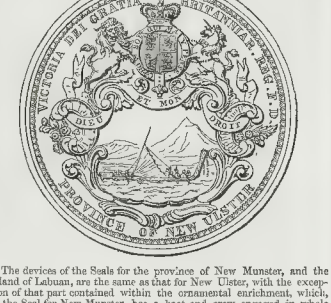
A few days since, the new Seals, of which we append engravings, were submitted to the Queen in Council, and approved of by her Majesty. They are the designs of W. Wyon, Esq., R.A., the Chief Engraver at the Royal Mint.



First is a Seal for the general Government of the Islands of New Zealand. The design consists of a column charged with the emblems of Christianity and Justice, on which is placed a mace, indicative of Municipal Government, standing between an English settler, in municipal robes, and a native of New Zealand in his national costume; and, over the column are the Royal arms and crown. The legend contains the Queen's name and titles, with the words "Islands of New Zealand."

The Seal for the province of New Ulster, in New Zealand, bears the Royal arms, supporters, crown, and mottoes, surmounting an ornamental enrichment enclosing a view of a native war canoe, and Mount Egmont in the distance; the whole surrounded by the legend, "VICTORIA, D.G., BRITANNIAR. REG., F.D. PROVINCE OF NEW ULSTER."



The devices of the Seals for the province of New Munster, and the Island of Labuan, are the same as that for New Ulster, with the exception of that part contained within the ornamental enrichment, which, in the Seal for New Munster, has a boat and crew engaged in whale fishing; and, in that for Labuan, the Royalist yacht, of the Rajah, Mr. Brooke, with the mountain of Keni-Balu in the distance, and the rising sun.

These designs are highly characteristic and appropriate, and must add to the already high fame of Mr. Wyon, in this branch of art.

MOST of the squadron under the orders of Sir Charles Napier will leave the Tagus for Cork about the 25th instant. The Hecate, 120, and the steamer Avenger, will be left at Lisbon. The Amphion, screw-frigate, is ordered to Spithead, also the Stromboli, steam-ship. The Terrible, frigate, is to join the Mediterranean fleet

POSTSCRIPT

THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

Events have deepened in importance since the account we have already published in the present Number, of the revolutionary proceedings in Paris; and though, in consequence of the direct line of communication between the French capital and the coast being interrupted by the destruction of the rails, to prevent the transmission of troops, we are unable to give full details; we are, however, through the expressing enterprise of our contemporary, the London Telegraph, in a position to give the main facts of "the situation," viz., that on the change of Ministry being announced, a short pause in the insurrection took place, but the people becoming dissatisfied with Count Molé as Minister, recommenced fighting, and scenes of the most sanguinary violence ensued; blood flowed, as in the Revolution of July; and at the Palais Royal (Louis Philippe's private property), where the assaults of the enraged populace were fiercest, the number that fell was stated at 500.

The Palais Royal was completely sacked and burnt, after a most sanguinary affray, which lasted from twelve o'clock to half-past one o'clock.

General Lamoricière is said to have been severely wounded; other accounts say killed. Similar rumours existed with respect to the fate of General Tiburce and of Sebastiani.

The Tuileries was also attacked about one o'clock, when his Majesty immediately abdicated the French Throne, in favour of the Count de Paris; and all the Royal Family left the Tuileries in private carriages.

Passing through the Place de la Concorde, towards Neuilly, the Duchess of Orleans went with her son to the Chambers, dressed in deep mourning, to place herself and her son under the protection of the Deputies. The Chambers have refused to allow Louis Philippe to resign.

A Correspondent, writing on the spot says:—

"The appearance of Paris is frightful. The people have vented their fury on the balconies of the Rue Basse du Rempart, opposite Guizot's, and threatened to destroy the street on account of the blood spilt there last night. The hotel is turned into a hospital for the wounded; and the people, dipping their fingers in the blood, have written along the walls "A mort Guizot." There are barricades all along the Boulevards, mostly unfinished, as the battle was over in an hour and a half.

The soldiers of the National Guard and people are fraternised.

The tocsin is still sounding at the National office.

A paper in pencil announces the following Provisional Government, Lamartine; Ledru Rollin; Marrast, editor of the National; Odillon Barrot, Marie, Arago, Garnier Page, Louis Blanc, secretary.

Accounts from the Chamber, between four and five o'clock, state the Provisional Government as accepted.

There will be efforts made to support the Duchess of Orleans.

The idea of a Republic is not agreeable to the mass of the Deputies.

FRIDAY NIGHT, HALF-PAST ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

We have just received another telegraphic express, to the following effect:—

BY ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

DOVER, FRIDAY, 9.30, P.M.

A Queen's Messenger arrived, bringing news that Louis Philippe has formally abdicated the throne. He proceeded to the Chamber of Deputies yesterday at half-past one, and announced his intention, in favour of the young Count de Paris; the Duchess of Orleans to be Regent. Thiers and Odillon Barrot have formed a new Ministry. It is certain that tranquillity will be now restored. Previous to the abdication, the City of Paris was in possession of the people, who sacked and fired the Tuileries. Louis Philippe, with his family, has departed for Neuilly.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.—On the motion of the Earl of HARDWICKE, a Select Committee on this subject was appointed; after a short discussion, in which Earl GREY stated it was the intention of the Government to bring in a measure this session for the alteration of the Navigation Laws.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

SUPPLY.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Mr HUME moved, as an amendment, that it was inexpedient to grant any money until the report of the Select Committee last appointed had been printed.

After a considerable discussion, in which Mr. WARD and Lord J. RUSSELL supported the course taken by Government in the case of the Budget, and Mr WAKLEY, Mr. OSBORNE, and Mr. S. O'BRIEN condemned it, the House divided, when the numbers were—

|---|---|
| For the amendment | 9 |
| Against it | 142 |
| Majority | 133 |

The amendment was accordingly lost, and the House went into Committee of Supply; the discussion in which, on the estimates proposed, occupied the House the remainder of the evening.

On the vote of £1,100,000 to defray the expenses of the Kaffir war, Mr. HUME moved, as an amendment, that the Chairman report progress, in order to give the House time to ascertain the true character of the proceedings. The Committee divided—For the amendment, 61; for the vote, 282: majority, 191. The vote was agreed to.

The vote of £245,500, to provide for the excess of the naval expenditure of last year, was agreed to, and the House adjourned at a few minutes before one o'clock.

THIS distinguished member of the Conservative party died on the 24rd instant. He was born 27th December, 17—, the second son of Henry Charles, sixth Duke of Beaufort, K.G., by his wife, the Lady Charlotte Sophia Leveson Gower, eldest son of the Duke of Sutherland. His education he completed at Christ Church, Oxford, where he was second class in Classics in 1813. In five years after he obtained a seat in Parliament for the county of Monmouth (in consideration of he continued to represent up to the time of his decease), and was within twelve months appointed one of the Lords of the Treasury—an office he held for some years.

His Lordship married, 27th July, 1822, the Hon. Emily Smith, tenth daughter of the late Lord Carrington, and has left three sons, Granville-Robert-Henry, born in 1823; Leveson Rhet-Henry, born in 1825; Reginald-George Henry, born in 1841, and two daughters, Emily-Catherine-Ann, and Constance-Hester-Louisa.

JOHN PETER ALLIX, ESQ., OF SWAFFHAM HOUSE, CO. CAMBRIDGE

THIS gentleman, who died a few days since, was born 2nd December, 1785, the eldest son and heir of John Peter Allix, Esq., of Swaffham, and grandson of Charles Allix, Esq. by Catherine, his wife, daughter of Dr. Green, Bishop of Ely. In 1841, Mr. Allix was returned to Parliament by the county of Cambridge, and, during his Parliamentary career, which terminated at the recent dissolution, he zealously co-operated with the Conservative party, taking rather a conspicuous part in support of agricultural protection. He was a magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for his native shire, and served as its High Sheriff in 1838.

The family from which he derived was founded in England by Dr. Peter Allix, of Alençon, head of the Protestant Church in France, who refusing, on the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, to conform, although tendered a Bishopric and even an Archbishopric, was banished the kingdom.

Mr. Allix, whose death we record, married in 1816 Maria, daughter of John Farden, Esq., of Leyton, in Essex, but does not, we believe, leave any issue.

VISION IN HEALTH AND DISEASE. By ALFRED SMEE, F.R.S., SURGEON to the Bank of England, Lecturer on Surgery &c. 64, Herne and Co., 123, Newgate-street.

A small work, containing four Lectures delivered at the Central London Ophthalmic Hospital. In the First Lecture, the Physiology of vision is considered; and the various motions in which we obtain our knowledge of the external world, through the medium of the eye, are amply demonstrated.

Above thirty diseased states of vision, each requiring particular treatment, are described; showing the danger and absolute folly of a person handing himself over to the tender mercies of the optician the moment he finds the powers of sight to be impaired. The diseases of adjustment—namely, slow adjustment, immutability of sight, partial far adjustment, partial near adjustment—are of great interest, as a cursory view of the cases would cause them to be mistaken for long sight and short sight, from which they present slight differences; and they may sometimes be remedied by medical treatment, though they would be injured by spectacles. Mr. Smee recommends that squinting eyes should be operated upon in early life, so that binocular vision may be secured to the patient.

The Third Lecture is dedicated to spectacles and other adjuncts to vision of special interest is laid upon the importance of the width of the spectacles being exactly adapted to the width between the visual axes, for which he has invented a instrument called a visuometer. The adaptation of the focal length of the glass to the state of the eye, he obtains through the means of another instrument, termed an optometer, without the use of which he states no person is justified in using spectacles. Coloured spectacles he has employed with good success for hay fever, and he states, "you will find that a pair of dark green spectacles will wonderfully alleviate the distressing symptoms which are incidental to this complaint." Ample directions are given for the selection of both convex and concave glasses for ordinary far and short sight. Mr. Smee describes the combination of glasses which must be employed for short sighted persons when they require the object to be somewhat magnified, as it appears that ordinary glasses are not beneficial to such cases.

For the sight of declining years, pantascopic spectacles are recommended, which are so arranged that the party sees through them when he reads or writes, but over them when he regards distant objects. For near sight, to preserve the integrity of binocular vision, he shows that it is of great importance to arrange the glasses so that they should be directed to the object viewed.

In the Fourth Lecture, the question of lights, and their influence on vision, is discussed. In this chapter, it is particularly enforced that the eyeshall be protected from the injurious rays of artificial lights. With respect to gaslights, Mr. Smee gives the preference to a fish-tail burner placed horizontally, as in that position, it gives the clearest and greatest amount of light.

THE WEATHER

During the week there have been two exhibitions of the aurora borealis, which occurred on Sunday and on Tuesday; the sky has been generally cloudy. some snow has fallen, and rain has been falling frequently; a gale of wind of rather long continuance was blowing on Tuesday and Wednesday, during the latter day the temperature of the dew points was from 10° to 12° below that of the air, and, consequently, the atmosphere was in a rather dry state

The following are some particulars of each day:

Thursday, the sky was mostly covered by cloud till the evening, when it became partially clear; the moon was, at times, surrounded by a corona, exhibiting the yellow, blue, and red colours of the rainbow; the direction of the wind was S.; and the average temperature of the day was 36½°. Friday, the sky was overcast till five P.M., and partially clouded afterwards: the reading of the barometer was high; the direction of the wind was N. at the former part of the day, and S. at the latter; the average temperature of the day was 34½°. Saturday, snow was falling early in the morning, and afterwards, between eight A.M. and noon, a thin misty rain was falling frequently; the sky was partially clear in the evening; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; and the average temperature of the day was 38°; the reading of the barometer decreased rapidly all day. Sunday, a fine misty rain was falling in the morning; occasionally during the day the sun was a great gloom; towards the evening the clouds became broken, and there was an aurora borealis; this was also seen at Cambridge; the direction of the wind was N.W.; and the average temperature of the day was 36½°. Monday, the sun was shining a little in the morning; with this exception the sky was overcast all day; a thin misty rain was falling, generally during the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 38°. Tuesday, the sky was overcast till the evening, rain falling occasionally, at times in gusts; a few rumbles of distant thunder; the direction of the wind was W.S.W., blowing strong and almost constantly during this day and following night and day; the average temperature of the day was 45°. Wednesday, the sky was alternately clear and dark; there were large driving clouds passing quickly; the day was stormy; the direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the average temperature was 44°; and that for the week ending this day was 39½°.

The following are the extreme thermometrical readings for each day.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Make it orderly and well,
According to the fashion of the time.—SHAKESPEARE.

Shooting is at an end, so far as relates to that portion of the United Kingdom called Great Britain; and hare-hunting, upon the authority of the sporting almanacks, terminates this day. It is not all on velvet with pass yet, however, for coursing greatly prevails during the whole month of March, neither does it appear that either pheasants or partridges have received that "protection," of the poulterers' shops of this metropolis may be regarded as any protection. Already the early fishermen is away to the salmon streams, intent on the laudable object of prize a phrase as appropriate in its literal as its figurative application. Indeed, in the former sense it is peculiarly applicable for netting salmons in waters reated by "tackemen," has taken out a character—the more you catch the more it costs you to do so by way. If your palate, like your sporting taste, happens to have a piscatory leaning Mrs Glass says—"Catch your hare, and then cook it"—but Sawney says, "hook your fish, and then hand it over to me for the cooking." A friend of ours has had a glorious day last week in Aberdeenshire—paying ten and sixpence for the privilege of fishing his scaly quarry, and five guineas for permission to retain it. This does not seem a bargain: we wish no friend of ours may pay dearer for his sporting whistle between this and Michaelmas

As the racing season draws near, the agents by which speculation on the pr cipal betting events is to be effected peep out now and then. They have now begun to show themselves, like the figures of Dutch clocks. Observe the quotations on the Derby of last week and of this. Note nominations that are coming in, and those that seem to recede. Let this be the preparatory step, that you may letter grapple with our coming lecture.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The medium of business transacted on the Chester Cup elevated War Eagle and Cracow above Blaze; and also placed Jonathan Wild so fairly up with the latter, that it was a toss up between which was third for either Swallow likewise improved. The Derby betting restored Surpleo to 9 to 1, after a liberal outlay; Loudsome and Swiss Boy were also in great force; and the new gelder, Fern, was backed eagerly at 50 to 1. In other respects, the betting was as unimportant as it was dull.

Upon that we have little to say: the "metallics" were but rarely called into play; and beyond an improvement in The Stranger and Fern (to the Derby), and War Eagle (for the Chester Cup), the day's proceedings were altogether unimportant. # THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

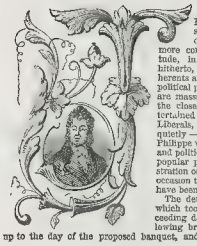
PROCESSION OF STUDENTS IN THE PLACE DE LA MADELEINE.



THE spirit of Absolutism on the one side, and of Liberty on the other—of Reform and of Misrule—are once more confronted together in hostile attitude, in the French capital, and, as hitherto, in the contest between the adherents and the opponents of the abuse of political power, blood is shed, and the people are massacred. The fears which towards the close of last week were generally entertained that the proposed Banquet of the Liberals, on Tuesday, would not pass off quietly—that the Government of Louis Philippe would so far outrage common sense and political right as to interfere with that popular protest against their mal administration of the national affairs, and thus give occasion to scenes of sanguinary violence—have been unfortunately realised.

The details of the unhappy occurrences, which took place on Tuesday and the succeeding days will be found below. The following brief history of the state of affairs up to the day of the proposed banquet, and of the arrangements made for the conduct of that festival, presents a connected narrative of matters from the date of our last publication.

The banquet, which had been originally fixed for Sunday last, was ultimately postponed to Tuesday, in order that the masses, being engaged at work, might not be congregated in such numbers as to present a menacing appearance, and thereby create an opportunity for a display of violence on the part of the authorities, as would be the case if the banquet were held on Sunday, when all the workmen are disengaged. In the meantime, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, addresses of sympathy and support from the provinces, to the members of the Opposition, continued to arrive by every mail.

According to the arrangement of the proceedings which were to have taken place on Tuesday, the banquet was to be held at noon in a field, the property of M. Nitot, in the Rue de Chaillot, near the Champs Elysées. Between eleven and twelve o'clock the opposition deputies were to assemble in the Place de la Madeleine. The other guests, at the same hour, were to meet in the Place de la Concorde. The deputies were to move in procession to the Champs Elysées, and be joined in the Place de la Concorde by the other guests. Ten thousand national guards in uniform, but unarmed, were to line the route, in double file, from the Place de la Concorde to the Arc de Triomphe, which terminates the avenue of the Champs Elysées. On the assembly of the guests one toast only was to be given, viz.: "Reform and the Right of Meeting," which was to have been introduced by a short address from M. Odillon Barrot. The meeting was then to disperse, and the national guards lining the route to separate. The number of guests, invited and subscribers, on Saturday night, amounted to 1600. On Sunday morning it exceeded 2000.

All exhibition of flags, banners, or any other emblem, and all exclamations or noisy manifestations, were expressly forbidden by the managing Committee. The members of the Committee were to marshal the procession, which was to have been distributed in bodies of superior officers of the National Guard of Paris and the Departments, Peers of France, a hundred Deputies, Magistrates, members of the Councils-General, National Guards, provincial deputations from the schools and colleges, &c.

Three members of the Chamber of Peers had signified their intention of attending the banquet, MM. Le Duc d'Harcourt, D'Alton Shee, and de Rolsy.

On Monday evening, a conversation in the Chamber of Deputies between M. Odillon Barrot and M. Duchatel, the Minister, gave the first official intimation that the banquet would be formally prohibited, M. Duchatel declaring, in the most explicit and unequivocal terms, that, after the formal declaration and programme which had been published in the morning in the Opposition journals, the Government had decided to resort to measures of force to prevent the proceedings as announced from taking place. The Chamber then adjourned to one o'clock on Tuesday.

That night proclamations by the Prefect of Police, and an order of the day by the Commander of the National Guard, were published, forbidding the banquet, and all assemblages of people, and prohibiting the appearance of National Guards in uniform, unless ordered by their chiefs.

In consequence of these acts of Government, the Opposition deputies met, and resolved that the banquet should not take place, that the people be entreated to submit, and that a motion for the impeachment of Ministers be made in the Chamber of Deputies.

THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

READING THE JOURNAL "LA PATRIE," BY TORCHLIGHT, IN THE STREET.

It was further resolved, that should this motion be negatived, they would resign their functions as deputies.

Early the next morning (Tuesday), all Paris was in commotion. Surprise and indignation at the conduct of the Government were depicted in every countenance of the thousands who congregated from all quarters towards the scene of the proposed Banquet; and expressions of the bitterest hostility to M. Guizot were uttered on all sides.

"About ten o'clock," writes the Paris Correspondent of the London Telegraph, under date of Tuesday, "people began to pour along the Boulevards and other of the principal thoroughfares, towards the Place de la Madeleine. From the Rue Montmartre to the Chaussée d'Antin, on the Boulevards, the stream continued for some time to be as large as is usual on Sundays and holidays. The people consisted almost exclusively of the working class, and had the appearance of having just abandoned their labour. Most of them were in blouses, and looked exceedingly dirty. Among them were a great many of those scowling, and, as the French say, sinistre faces, which only show themselves in daylight at times of great popular convulsions.

"By twelve o'clock, the crowd which hastened to and from the Place de la Madeleine was so great as to make it advisable for the shopkeepers to put up their shutters—in fact, many of them, dreading an outbreak, had not opened at all. By this time, the crowd on the Boulevards, and from the Chaussée d'Antin to the Church of the Madeleine, was so large as to necessitate the attendance of the forces. The pavement in front of the Hotel of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was particularly crowded. A troop of soldiers kept the people from approaching nearer to the Hotel, an attack on it being dreaded, owing to the great unpopularity of M. Guizot, the Minister of Foreign Affairs. A troop of the Municipal Guard, on foot, occupied the space in front of the principal entrance, and a troop of the horse municipal guards paraded up and down. The people, however, contented themselves with throwing a few stones at the windows; after which, they not only showed no disposition to attack the hotel, but were particularly good humoured, and amused themselves by joking and jeering the unfortunate wights, male and female, whose appearance presented anything peculiar as they drove rapidly past in carriages and cabs.

"Small platoons of soldiers, with fixed bayonets, marched up and down the broad pavement from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the church. People were kept from approaching the church by a line of soldiers, and a troop was drawn up near the guard-house, which stands by the side of the [illegible].

"The Rue Royale presented nothing particular. It was, however, crowded chiefly by people of the lower classes. The shops, which are not very numerous in that street, were all closed.

"Arriving at the Place de la Concorde, which was the great centre of attraction, I found it completely occupied by an immense crowd: there must have been many thousands. The entrance to the bridge which faces the Chamber of Deputies, was occupied by strong detachments of dragoons and horse municipal guards. When the people pressed too closely on them, the soldiers charged, whereupon the people ran away in all directions. Generally the soldiers contented themselves by merely driving the people a short distance away, but on one occasion they classed them a distance of about fifty yards, and I saw their swords gleaming in the air as if they were about to strike; but I neither saw nor heard of any blow being actually struck. I am bound to say that both people and soldiers seemed to think this good fun, and it really was amusing to see several thousand persons, male and female, young and old, scampering off among the trees in the Champs Elysées. But I need scarcely remark that it was very dangerous sort of fun indeed; for, if too often repeated, it would be almost certain to end in bloodshed.

"Whilst I was near the bridge—this was about one o'clock a regiment of Light Dragoons marched along the Quai, for the Hotel des Invalides, having come, no doubt, from the Ecole Militaire. It was headed by the band, which played merry tunes—a circumstance which occasioned considerable surprise, considering for what purpose the regiment was called out.

"The Quai, near the garden of the Tuileries, was completely blocked up by a dense crowd, as was also the terrace in the garden facing the Place de la Concorde. The gates, however, opening on the Place were closed, and, at about [illegible]

"All the streets leading to the Chamber of Deputies were, like the bridge, occupied by strong detachments of troops, and no one was allowed to pass, except the deputies, the newspaper reporters, and those who were furnished with special tickets of admission.

"A large crowd has been assembled all the morning before the office of the National newspaper, in the Rue Lafeilet[illegible].

"Nearly all the shops in the Rue St. Honoré, the Rue Neuve des Petits Champs, and almost all the other streets in the vicinity of the Place de la Concorde and the Place de la Madeleine are closed. On the other side of the river the same is the case in the streets adjacent to the Chamber of Deputies.

"An eye-witness, also writing on Tuesday, says:

"I was much struck with the, in most respects, perfectly similar appearance of that quarter (the neighbourhood of the Madeleine Church) to-day and at the same hour of the 27th July, 1830; the same species of attack on the Hotel des Affaires Etrangères (then inhabited by Prince Polignac): the same measures of repression; the same expression of hatred towards the Minister on the part of the people; the same air of severity on the countenances of the gendarmes. Near to the gate occurred an incident precisely of a kind that was witnessed on nearly the same spot on the former occasion. A horse soldier ordered a man to move on, telling him that if he did not he would cut him down. The man, folding his arms, and looking sternly at the soldier, replied, 'Would you, coward?' The trooper rode off.

"At the Madeleine I found the crowd becoming more dense. This continued the whole length of the Rue Royale. The people, every moment called upon to disperse themselves, answered with cries of 'Vive la Reforme!' 'Vive la Ligne!' and then, bursting into the 'Chœur des Girondins,' 'Mourir pour la Patrie!'

In the Place de la Concorde matters wore a strange appearance. It had been filled with people as on the days of the fêtes. The Municipal Guards of the posts at the corner near the Turkish Embassy sallied out, and attempted to drive the crowd before them; but, instead of succeeding, were obliged to retreat into their fortified guard-house to avoid being disarmed, for not only did the people not give way, but absolutely pressed upon them. The soldiers had scarcely secured themselves within, when the people ran off in their turn fearing that they would be fired upon.

"Immediately afterwards the people stopped a carriage in which was a Minisstopped a carriage in which was a Ministerial Deputy on his way to the Chambers, which is only separated from the Place de la Concorde by the bridge. They made him alight, and then shook him for several minutes. Ultimately they allowed him to proceed. A different process was adopted towards, it was said, M. Marrast, principal editor of the National, whom they cheered, and all but 'chaired.'

"You will hence perceive that there is to-day the same mixture of the grave and the gay, of tragedy and farce, that a French assemblage (I will not call them mob) always exhibits."

During the evening and night of Tuesday, the agitation and confusion continued. The crowded masses of the people began to organize a more systematic [illegible] to the troops. In the neighbourhood of the Halle, and of the [illegible] Marie, and the Temple, having obtained some arms, they [illegible] but they were ultimately beaten, and many prisoners taken. Some lives were [illegible] The troops bivouacked on the Boulevards, and in the markets, and other public places; and the mob set fire to the depôt of omnibuses at Neuilly. A guard-house in the Champs Elysées was also burned.

BEATING THE RAPPEL FOR THE NATIONAL GUARD place in the neighbourhood of the Tuileries was crowded with troops, and there were forty pieces of cannon on the Esplanade of the Invalids.

The rappel was beaten, but not one-tenth of the National Guard answered the summons. There were, however, in the city of Paris 100,000 troops of the line under arms.

On Wednesday, the National Guard of the second Arrondissement, to the number of about 500 or 600, assembled at an early hour in the Rue Lepelletier, opposite the Opera. It was at first supposed that their intentions were hostile to the party, but they soon acquitted a conviction that they were fraternised with the same sentiments as the immense majority of the population. Their motto was—"Reform, and the dismissal of M. Guizot." When the intentions of the citizen soldiers became known, the immense crowd assembled before them, crying "Vive la Garde Nationale!" "Vive la Réforme!" The latter cry was loudly repeated by the National Guards, the officers joining in it, and flourishing their swords. Both then fraternised, and proceeded along the Rue de Rivoli, and drew up between the Rue du Dauphin, and the Rue du 29 Juillet. They had no sooner taken their position than an officer (Ordonnance of General Jacqueminot, rode up, and, after exchanging a few words with the Lieutenant-Colonel, rode back in all haste to the chateau. An immense crowd then assembled round the National Guard, and their cries of "Vive la Réforme!" and "Down with the Ministry," could be distinctly heard by the King and the Royal Family. Nevertheless no troops were ordered in that direction, and the people and Nationals were left quietly to fraternise, although the two extremities of the street were occupied by an immense force.

In the meantime the Nationals of the Third Legion collected to the number of 3000 on and about the Place des Petits Pères, and their officers having held a council, agreed to depute their Colonel to the King to acquaint his Majesty with the wishes of the National Guard; in other words, Reform and the dismissal of the Cabinet. That officer immediately proceeded to the palace, but was not admitted into the Royal presence. He merely saw General Jacqueminot, the Commander General of the National Guard, who promised that he would that instant carry himself the memorial to the King. The National Guards remained assembled on the square, awaiting the return of the Colonel, their determination being to march upon the Tuileries if the reply was negative. Occasionally strong patrols were sent out to interpose, if necessary, between the combatants, but no hostilities took place in the neighbourhood, the troops quietly remaining on the adjoining Place des Victoires, without giving the least provocation. The Nationals fired by them, crying for Reform and the dismissal of Ministers, were responded and followed by an immense mass of people uttering the same cries; and the soldiers by their countenances testified that they concurred in that wish. In one of the by-streets a detachment of troops, stationed there to intercept passage, accepted bread and wine from the people: and their officer looked on, nay, encouraged them to accept the provisions offered to them

The Fourth Legion also took arms and stationed detachments in different directions to maintain order and prevent the effusion of blood.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.—TUESDAY.

All the avenues leading to the Palais Bourbon were occupied by horse and foot Municipal Guards and troops of the line. A squadron of dragoons was stationed in front of the office along the quay, whilst another kept constantly moving to clear the bridge of La Concorde. In advance of this bridge, on the side of the Place de la Revolution, was a numerous body of horse chasseurs employed in dispersing a multitude of about five thousand or six thousand individuals, who quietly retired before them, singing the "Marseillaise," and crying "Vive la Réforme! à bas Guizot, l'Homme de Gand!" The passage through the adjoining streets, and the Place de Bourgogne, was intercepted by troops of the line, and none but deputies were permitted to pass. Even they were permitted to enter the Palace. General Perrault was on horseback in the Court, ready to take the command of the troops, and a Commissary of Police was stationed at the foot of the bridge to address the legal summonses to the people.

The Chamber presented a gloomy aspect. Few deputies were in attendance; the benches of the Opposition were completely vacant. M Guizot arrived at an early hour, he looked pale, but confident. He was shortly afterwards followed by the Ministers of Finance, Public Instruction, and Commerce. Marshal Bugeaud, who was believed to have accepted the military command of Paris, in the event of a revolt, took his seat close to the Ministerial bench.

The Chamber then resumed the adjourned discussion on the bill relative to the removal of the privilege of the Bank of Rouen.

At three o'clock M. Odillon Barrot entered. He was accompanied by Messrs. Duvergier de Hauranne, Marie, Thiers, Garnier Pages, &c. Th ir appearance produced some sensation. Shortly afterwards M. de Hauranne went up to the President and handed him a paper, supposed to be a proposition for the impeachment of Ministers

This paper having been communicated by the President to M Guizot, the latter, after perusing it, laughed immoderately MM. Thiers, Dupin, Lamartine, Billault, Crémieux, and the Minister of the Interior and Justice next made their appearance, but the discussion on the Bank Bill continued until 5 o'clock, and no incident of interest occurred

When the discussion terminated, M. Odillon Barrot ascended the tribune, and deposited on the table a formal proposition for the impeachment of the Ministers. The President, however, raised the sitting without reading it, to the great disappointment of the Opposition, but announced that it should be submitted to the approbation of the bureaux on Thursday. The House then adjourned

WEDNESDAY

M. Vavin, one of them, a deputy of Paris, rose amidst a profound silence, and said that he had a solemn duty to accomplish, which was to call the Minister of the Interior to account for the scenes passed in the capital. During twenty-four hours serious disturbances had taken place in Paris, and the population remarked with astonishment the absence of the National Guard On Monday orders had been given for its attendance. Why had they been countermanded? Why was it only after a first collision that the drummers were permitted to beat to arms? If from the beginning the National Guard had been called out, fatal misfortunes would have been averted. M. Guizot replied that he did not deem it expedient to answer those questions. The King had that moment sent for Count Molé (acclamations from the Left) to charge him with the reconstruction of a Cabinet. (New acclamations.) As the present Ministers continued in office (added M. Guizot) they would cause order to be respected.

The Minister having sat down, M. Odillon Barrot rose and said that, considering the situation of the Cabinet, he consented to the adjournment of his proposition for the impeachment of Ministers.

M. Dupin, who followed, said that it would be impossible for the Ministers to maintain order and provide for their own security under existing circumstances. M. Guizot answered that they would be able to maintain order and enforce respect to the laws until the King should have relieved them from their functions. The Left, however, insisting on the adjournment, and M. Peyronnet opposing it, it was put from the chair and rejected by a large majority, the Opposition alone having voted for it. The sitting was afterwards raised

The following list of Ministers circulated in the Chamber:

Count Molé, President of the Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs.
M. Dufaure, Minister of the Interior
M. Vivien, of Justice.
M. Billault, of Marine.
M. Gouin, of Agriculture and Commerce.
M Hypolite Passy, of Finance
M de Tocqueville, of Public Instruction
M Lanyer or Count Daru, of Public Works
The Minister of War was not known.
The bloodshed during the two days does not appear to have been considerable

We add some particulars from the pen of an eye-witness of the events of Wednesday)

"I descended into the street instantly, and found that the National Guards, to the amount of 150, had formed in two lines across the Rue Lepelletier one division at each extremity of the theatres. In the centre were the officers Outside, the people frantic with joy. On asking a National Guard what had happened? 'We have declared for Reform,' said he. 'that is, some of us differ about Reform, but we are agreed about Guizot!' 'Vive la Réforme!' 'Vive la Garde Nationale!' cried the people incessantly

"An hour afterwards the National Guards proceeded, with their sapeurs at their head, in full uniform, to the Tuileries, to declare their sentiments.

"They returned about a quarter o'clock, and occupied the Rue Lepelletier again. A platoon closed the street on the Boulevard. Loud cries of 'Vive la Garde Nationale!' called me to the window again A squadron of cuirassiers, supported by half a squadron of chasseurs à cheval, arrived. The Chef d'Escadron gave orders to draw swords. The ranks of the National Guards closed. The cries of the people redoubled, although not a man of them was armed. The squadron made a half movement on the Rue Lepelletier, when the officer in command of the National Guards drew his sword, advanced, and saluted him. A few words were exchanged. They separated. The one placed himself at the head of his soldiers, and gave the word to 'shoulder arms' and they resumed their march accompanied by the cheers and clapping of hands of the multitude. The officer of National Guards returned very quietly to his post, and sheathed his sword

"I am told the words exchanged between the officers were these:—'Who are these men?' 'They are the people.' 'And those in uniform?' 'They are the Second Legion of the National Guard of Paris.' 'The people must disperse.' 'They will not.' 'I shall use force.' 'Sir, the National Guard sympathise with the people, the people who demand Reform.' 'They must disperse.' 'They will not.' 'I must use force.' 'Sir, we the National Guards sympathise in the desire for Reform and will defend them.

"I am assured by persons who say that they heard all that passed, that the officer and the cuirassiers cried 'Vive la Réforme!' But I cannot affirm or contradict it. I know, however, that the soldiers looked serious, but not savage.

"HALF-PAST 2.—Thrice since similar scenes have occurred. The Municipal Guards, who at present occupy the unpopular position of the gendarmes of 1830, are now, by order of Government, mixed up with the troops of the line, on whom the people are lavish of their compliments and caresses. A column of cavalry and infantry, Municipal Guards à cheval, Cuirassiers, and Municipal Guards a pied, and infantry of the line, arrived by the Boulevard at the end of the Rue Lepelletier. They made a move like the others as if to wheel into that street, but the attitude of the National Guard made them pause, and immediately the word was given to continue their march, the people rending the air with cries of 'Vive la Reforme!' 'Vive la Garde Nationale!' and 'Vive la Ligne!' Again a precisely similar occurrence took place, but this time it ended with the absolute retreat of the troops, for they turned round and retired up the Boulevard.

"I give you these particulars, because they passed under my own eyes, and because they will serve for the history of that which has taken or is taking place throughout Paris."

THE ILLUSTRATIONS

We are enabled, by the activity of our Artists at Paris, (from whom we have received the Sketches,) to present the reader with the accompanying Illustrations of some of the scenes detailed in the adjoining columns. Upon the front page, we have the troops charging the crowd before M Guizot's Hotel: at page 119, the Reading of the La Paix "by Anticipation"—such was the intensity of the people to learn the progress of the movement. The Place de la Concorde will be recognised as one of the great foci of the insurgents: and the fourth scene shows the Rappel for the National Guard, in many instances but equivocally answered. At page 126, we give two other scenes; and Portraits of M. Odillon Barrot and M Guizot

We shall, next week, resume our illustrations of this great struggle.

We have received the following letter from one of our Artists:—

"Paris, Mardi, 5 Heures.

"Monsieur Le Redacteur—Voici déjà deux croquis des événements qui se brouillent. Il y a des coups de sabre, des hommes blessés; des barricades s'organisent dans la Rue St. Honoré. Cela va marcher mal; gare les coups. Nouvelles au courant. Toutes les boutiques se ferment. Hier soir la Patrie, Journal du sour de l'Opposition, annonçait le désistement des députés au sujet du banquet. Ce journal était encore en mains des vendeurs et la hautevoix sur tous les boulevards et dans les rues. Voilà le premier croquis. L'autre est la lecture des proclamations sur les murailles, addressée aux habitans de Paris et à la Garde Nationale, que le peuple allait lire le long des murailles avec des chandelles et des lanternes. Voilà tout ce que je puis vous envoyer aujourd'hui. Depuis ce matin je suis dans la ville avec le desdateur: il n'y a pas de démonstrations de la part des députés, mais les étudians et la populace se sont rendus à la Place de la Madeleine à l'heure précédemment indiquée. Je vous enverai demain un croquis de la Place de la Madeleine, avec la procession des étudians. Ils se sont rendus de là à la Chambre des Députés. Après avoir c.i.i quelque temps devant le palais, ils ont crié 'A bas Bourbons! et en hurlant 'A bas Guizot! Vive la Réforme!' ils ont alors se poster aux alentours de l'Hôtel des Affaires Etrangères, de manière que plus d'acheminement que jamais, 'A bas Guizot!' Alors les municipaux à cheval ont fait des pentes charges pour repousser la populace. Ce sur ce demain nous ferons les deux grands croquis: 1. La Place de la Madeleine, avec la procession des étudians; 2. Le Ministère des Affaires Etrangères, avec la foule, et les municipaux la repoussant. . . . . "C. P."

ABBOTS LEIGH CHURCH.

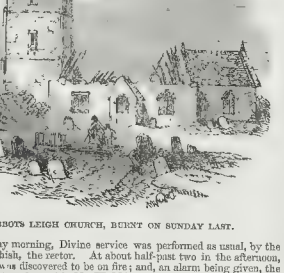
ON Sunday afternoon last, this very interesting structure was reduced by fire to the state shown in our Illustration, from a sketch by a Correspondent resident at Leigh.

The village of Abbots Leigh is situated about four miles from Bristol, on the river Avon, in the direction of the Bristol Channel. The Church, of which little more than the tower remains, stood upon the crown of Leigh Hill. The particulars of the catastrophe are as follow:—



ABBOTS LEIGH CHURCH, BURNT ON SUNDAY LAST.

On Sunday morning, Divine service was performed as usual, by the Rev. Mr. Whish, the rector. At about half-past two in the afternoon, the Church was discovered to be on fire; and, an alarm being given, the neighbours, together with Mr. W. Miles, M.P., were speedily on the spot, and the utmost exertions were used to subdue the flames, but without effect, from the great quantity of wood in the roof, and within the edifice. Express was also sent off to Bristol for engines, which arrived at the Church at about half-past five o'clock; but by this time, the wind being very high, the flames had so spread that the roof had fallen in, and almost the whole of the interior destroyed. The utmost efforts were then made with the engines to save that portion of the structure in which are the monuments of the Miles' family, and of Mr. and Mrs. Lane, who erected Charles II: fortunately, these efforts were successful, so that, by eight o'clock, the flames were subdued. The cause of the fire has not been correctly ascertained; but it is supposed to have originated from one of the flues of the stove having become over heated, and set fire to the wood-work of the roof, and the flaming timber falling in, ignited the interior fittings, as pulpit, pewings, gallary, &c.; so that there remain now only the chancel, vestry-room, and tower.

EMBEZZLEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEY. At the sitting of the Commission Court on Friday (last week) Mr J. H. Mason, an officer of the Board of Works, who had been acquitted of the charge of forgery on the preceding Tuesday, was arraigned for embezzling money, the property of the Board of Works. The witnesses examined were Sir John Burgoyne, Mr. Rankin, Mr. Griffith, and some other persons connected with the Board of Works; and from the evidence adduced it appeared that the manner in which the "business" of the department has been conducted was anything but creditable to the heads of the office The jury, after half-an hour's deliberation, brought in a verdict of Guilty upon all the counts. On Saturday morning Mason was brought up for judgment, and Mr. Justice Perrin sentenced the prisoner to seven years' transportation TERRIBLE CALAMITY.—Sunday night last a dreadful fire took place in Killarney, by which six individuals lost their lives The extensive pawnbroking establishment of Mr. Carberry, in the New-street, which contained the deposits of the poor from all parts of Kerry, to the amount of several thousands sterling, was the scene of this dreadful catastrophe. Two persons in their observations to escape were killed, and four children perished in the flames. The affair is a most melancholy one.

The Royal Association had its usual weekly meeting on Monday. Alderman Butler in the chair. The rent for the week was £36.

DREADFUL FIRE IN RED LION-COURT. On Tuesday morning, shortly after one, a fire of a destructive character, nearly attended with a sacrifice of life, broke out upon the premises in the occupation of Mr. Hou.. (late Jones), the Red Lion Tavern, Red Lion-Court, Fleet-street. At the time of the outbreak the whole of the females were asleep. They were, after considerable difficulty, rescued, and, by means of the fire escapes, were rescued from their perilous situation.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The active and enterprising Mr. Mitchell has favoured us with another novelty from Paris, in the shape of a three-act drama, called the "Chevalier d'Essonne." Our opinion of the piece, on its own merits, is not a very favourable one. The subject is neither new nor freshly treated, but the duties of a manager of a French theatre towards the public are totally different to those of a national establishment. The latter may only represent such pieces as seem to him calculated to raise the standard of taste and elevate the character of the drama of his country: whilst the former has to select from a foreign repertoire such plays as best represent to an English public the traits and peculiarities of the French stage, and exhibit, in the most favourable light, the talent of the artiste he has been enabled to engage. The plot of "Le Chevalier d'Essonne" turns upon the incident of a lady assuming the character of her brother from motives of fraternal affection, and being drawn by such assumption to adopt various manly habits, and associate with soldiers—chiefly, however, with a pleasant honest Gascon, to whom she eventually gives her hand. The lady was of course personated by Mademoiselle Nathalie, who, both in her male and female attire, looked and acted so well, as to throw considerable liveliness into a somewhat dull piece. There is a piquancy in these reversions of costume that is always attractive, although, why we should like to see a pretty woman look as ugly while she is in pantaloons, as a man does in that part of the dress, was well played by M. Montaland, and Mademoiselle Marot looked and acted charmingly in the part of an innocent girl, who is engaged as mistress to the lady "travalier," thereby exciting the jealousy of her former young lover. The costumes were, as usual, in excellent taste. We notice, in whatever is acted here, a grace and finish about the performance, that stands out in singular contrast to the coarse inartistic style cultivated in some of our popular London theatres

PRINCESS'.

Mr. Macready renewed his engagement here on Monday evening, appearing, with Mrs. Butler, in "Macbeth." The house was crowded, and the reception of each performer most enthusiastic.

It is said in the theatrical circles that Mr. Macready's contemplated visit to America will terminate his dramatic career, and this report appears to be authenticated by a speech made on the occasion of his benefit at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, when, at the conclusion of the play, he was called for from the curtain, and on making his appearan cewas hailed with loud cheers, which were again and again repeated. On silence being gained, Mr. Macready, who was labouring under great emotion, thanked the audience very sincerely for their kind expression of regard for him. He said he looked upon Newcastle as an old home; his visits to it were anticipated with pleasure, and he felt it with regret. It was encouraged by the generous support it gave to dramatic efforts, and their kindness he had never forgot. The next visit he should pay them would, in all probability, be his last: he would then have to say the word "Farewell," a word always painful to utter, but more so to him on that occasion doubly so. He proceed retiring from the stage at an early day, not because he felt age creeping upon him, or his faculties or energies impaired, but because of the present deplorable condition of our national drama. Wishing them all health and prosperity, he now for a season bade them adieu.

Mr. Wilks has adapted he once popular ballet, "The Revolt of the Harem," for ASTLEY'S, under the name of "The Battle of the Amazons." The subject offers great scope for scenic effect, and is admirably suited for a "spectacle" theatre. We shall next week give a notice of it, in full

The STRAND theatre, it is said, is about to come under a new management. None have hitherto been successful, the size of the auditory being too small to hold money enough to support an efficient company

The engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley has been renewed at the HAYMARKET, where "The Wife's Secret" has lost none of its attraction.

MUSIC.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS

The 110th Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was celebrated on Tuesday night, in Freemasons' Hall. R. Palmer, Esq., M.P., was the President of the day, and, in the absence of Sir G. Smart, Bridge, in consequence of a slight attack of gout. At these gatherings, music forms the principal attraction, and oratory is confined to very narrow limits. The objects of this excellent institution were ably stated in addresses from the chairman; the Rev. D C. Delafosse, M.A.; the veteran Professor, Mr. Horsley; and Mr Knyvett, the father of the Society. The health of Hector Berlioz, as the representative of music in France, and of her musical artists, was given with enthusiastic plaudits, and the composer and critic responded to the compliment in French, in a neat address.

Nearly £900 were announced in donations; amongst which were £30 from the Duke of Cambridge; twenty guineas from E. Delafield, Esq., and A. Webster, Esq., Directors of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden; ten guineas each from the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Major Courtenay, R. Hodgson, Esq.; T. Harrison, Esq.; Miss Masson, the vocalist; £5 from Messrs. Broadwood and Co.; Edward Benedict, Esq.; S. R. Palmer, Esq., M.P.; W. Curling, Esq.; and W. Dixon, Esq.; besides five guineas each from M. Lord, Esq., and C. L. Grabsen, Esq

The executors of the hon. treasurer, John Parry, Esq., were duly recognised. The musical treat was of the best order. A band, comprising Harper and his sons, Williams, Lazarus, the C rds, sen. and jun., Grattan Cooke, Platt, Malsch, Baumann, Frosini, Healey, Godfrey, Egerton, &c., performed the marches expressly composed for the Society by Haydn and Winter. Madrigals by John Bennet (1601) and Wilbye (1609), were sung by the boys of Westminster Abbey, Messrs. Hill, Taylor, Walsh, Allen, Cross, Grice, Morgan, Beale, Smithson, &c. J. Smith's Glee, "Return blest Days," was beautifully sung by Francis, Lockey, Howe, and Kench, and was encored. Horsley's Glee "Cold is Cadwallo's Tongue" was finely sung by Machin, Barnby, Howe, Bennett, and Kench. Braham, exhibited his energy in Carter's battle song, "Stand to your guns." Reeves was compelled to sing Balfe's ballad, "In this arm chair," twice; and Miss Dolby was warmly complimented for her exquisite interpretation of Hatton's clever song, "Day and Night" quite a Mendelssohnian inspiration. The chaste rendering of Haydn's canonet, "My mother bids me bind my hair," by Miss Ellen Lyon, secured for her the suffrages of the company. An ode, written in addition to the late Archbishop of York, a subscriber for 40 years, R. T. S. Stevens's "Gladd cap't towers" was sung by Hill, Barnby, Bennett, Elliott, Bradbury, and Machin. The ladies, who were present in great force, were treated with the finest compliment of all—a handsome collection was made in their behalf, and the new concert-room at the Committee of Management Mr H. Leslie is the hon. secretary, and G. Curtis, Esq., the treasurer. Prince Albert, and the Duke of Cambridge, are members. The orchestra comprises no fewer than 120 performers, with four professors, H. Blagrove, R. Hill, G. Griesbach, and W. Blagrove; eleven violas, with two artists, Henry Hill, and R. Blagrove; seventeen violoncellos, eight double basses, with Caudani, Percival, and Severn; besides the usual complement of wind instruments. Amongst the players we noticed Lord Arundel, trumpet, Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton, R. Jekyll, W. Broadwood, W. H. Poynder, Esqs., flutes, the Duke of Leinster, Rev. G. Herbert, Rev. G. Macdonald, double basses, Lord G. Fitzgerald, the Marquis of Kildare, Hon. Major Legge, Sir W. Hedly-ote, violoncelli; the Rev. F. Vickery, and J. Oliphant, Esq., violas, Lieutenant-General Hon. A. Upton, Captain Reid, R.N., Hon. R. Coke, Sergeant Lawes, Rev. Mr. Sims, Rev. G. Hanbury, &c., violins.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT-GARDEN Mr. Frederick Gye has been appointed Acting Manager, a gentleman who with his long experience in the conduct of various public entertainments eminently qualifies him. The second amphitheatre and gallery, which last season formed separate stories, have been thrown into one vast incline, and will contain upwards of 1700 persons The six front rows, retaining the name of "Second Amphitheatre," will be reserved seats, at five shillings; and the remainder of the seats will form the "Gallery," the entrance to which will be half-a-crown. The construction is such that, at the last row of seats at the summit of the gallery, an excellent view of stage and orchestra will be obtained. The season will commence on Tuesday, March 7th, with "Tancredi," in which Alboni and Madame Persiani, and the new tenor, Luigi Mei, will appear. M. Appiani's new ballet for Flora Fabbri will be mounted with great splendour Mdlle. Marmet, who is engaged at the Academie Royale de Musique, as première danseuse, has been added to the ballet, and has reached London; as also Mdlle. Lecpidine Brussi, the youthful Viennese dancer, who recently created such a sensation in the Grand Opera.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Haydn's "Creation," in which Miss Wallace, pupil of the composer, was received with such applause in her début, will be repeated on Wednesday next. The season will not be longer the conductor of the society. The post has been offered to, and declined by, Costa. There is a question of Sterndale Bennett being chairman's successor

INQUEST ON MR COATES.—On Wednesday, a Coroner's inquest was held by Mr Wakley, M.P., and a jury, at 28, Montague-square, on the body of Robert Coates, aged 76, who some thirty years ago was well known as "the amateur of tragedy" and "Romeo Coates." Mr. T. Tatum, of 3, George-street, Hanover-square, deposed that he was sent for to see the deceased on Wednesday morning last, at eight o'clock. Deceased had nearly recovered from a state of collapse. He told witness that he had been run over by a street cab (Hanson's) near the Haymarket, Covent-garden, about one o'clock that morning Witness found several ribs broken on both sides of the deceased: there was also a slight injury of the knee: the wound afterwards sloughed, and there was diffused inflammation; mortification came on, and death was the consequence. The jury, under the advice of the coroner, returned a verdict of "Died from injuries received from being run over by a street cab,—manslaughter, against some person or persons unknown."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS

THE LIEUTENANTS IN THE NAVY. A meeting of Lieutenants of the Navy was held on Monday, at the London Tavern, Lieut Sir Henry Jervis, Bart., in the chair, for the purpose of agreeing to a memorial to her Majesty the Queen, praying her to place the lieutenants in the naval service in a similar position as to retirement and advantages granted to every other class of naval officers. The memorial was read, and, after a number of naval officers had spoken on the subject, it was agreed to unanimously. A subscription in aid of the expense likely to attend the bringing of the subject before the public was agreed to, when a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, and a committee was appointed; after which the meeting adjourned.

MUNIFICENT DONATION.—On Saturday evening last a special Court of the Governors of the Hospital for Consumption was held at the Institution in Bromton, for the purpose of considering the regulations best calculated to advance the interests of the Rose Charity Fund, a Sanatarian object, towards which Mr. Charles Dixon, of Stanmore, had just forwarded the handsome donation of £500 the object of the fund being to provide relief for convalescent patients, who, although necessarily discharged, are yet unable to return immediately to active employment. It was resolved that the intentions of the generous donor should be fully carried into effect.

MR. COLSON, of Lincoln's Inn, has been appointed by Sir G Grey to succeed Mr. Bethune as Parliamentary counsel to the Home Office, his duty being to prepare the bills originating with any department of the Government, and revising and reporting upon all bills brought before the House, and referred to him by the Secretary of State. Mr. Bethune, Mr. Colson's predecessor, proceeds immediately to India, where he will fill the place formerly occupied by Mr. Macaulay.

SUICIDE IN MILLBANK PRISON. On Monday Mr Bedford held an inquest in this prison, on the body of John Mc Morgan, aged 28, under sentence of transportation for robbery. Edward Bakon, one of the warders, said he had charge of the deceased, and observed him to be of a cheerful disposition. He left him in his cell at six o'clock on Saturday evening, and on the following morning found him hanging by the cords of his hammock to one of the pegs on which the towels were hung. He was quite dead. Verdict of "Temporary insanity."

DON MIGUEL DE BRAGANCA.—A few days since, Dom Miguel de Braganca, attended by Mr. A. R. Saraiva, visited the Roman Catholic Chapel of "Our Lady," in Grove-road, St. John's Wood. On the presence of the prince becoming known, he was received with every mark of distinction by the officiating priest, the principal of whom (the Rev. Mr. M'Neal) conducted him over the sacred edifice, with the chaste Gothic style and elegant simplicity of which the prince expressed himself highly gratified. During his visit the Prince experienced a most agreeable surprise on being shown a beautiful "chalice veil" and "corporal" of green satin, tastefully and richly embroidered in gold, which had been presented to the chapel by his sister, the former Princess Regent of Portugal, Dona Isabel Maria, all worked by her Royal Highness' own hands. On its having been remarked to the Prince how little his Royal sister, when some years since the sole of the plous gift to a chapel she had never seen in England, could have thought it would ever prove the fortuitous cause of so much gratification to her illustrious brother, who was then an exile in Rome, he replied "Not so did I think, fifteen years ago, in Portugal, that I should now be in England as I am, and should have recognised, as I lately have, exhibited in some London jewellers' shop-windows, the plate of Portuguese chateaux, and even some pieces of my own private plate" The Prince, on leaving, expressed himself much pleased with the courtesy shown to him during his visit.

HEALTH OF THE METROPOLIS.—Deaths registered in the week ending Saturday last 1,990; females, 964; total, 1134. The return this week, for the first week in the year, shows that the mortality of London is returning within its ordinary limits; for, although the number of deaths from zymotic diseases (including typhus and influenza) are still slightly beyond the average of healthy years, not, however, be it remarked, excessively so, yet the total excess over the average of the past five winters is only 37, a number easily explainable by the increase of population. Births—males, 680, females, 892; total, 1272; being an excess of 138 above the number of deaths. Mean height of the barometer, 29.808; thermometer, highest, 53°; lowest, 20.2; range, 47°. The general direction of the wind, S.S.W.; horizontal movement of the air, 1235 miles, mean amount of cloud, 8.5, maximum pressure of the wind on the square foot, 4.6 lbs. (on Monday); sum of rain, 0.19 inch

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

As the greater part of last week's impression had been struck off, previously to the Minister's financial propositions becoming known in the City, the subject is again adverted to this week.

The proposition to increase the Income-tax for two years to 5 per cent, has occupied the greatest share of attention. Although it was not unanticipated, it nevertheless was most generally condemned. There were, however, few doubts entertained of its being ultimately carried It was remarked, that if confined to the imposition of the increased per centage must be much greater and those whose voices are most powerful in the Legislature have nearly evinced any disposition to tax themselves for the relief of the middling classes. The speech of Sir Robert Peel, on Monday, in favour of the Ministerial proposition, confirmed the impression that, with a few modifications, the measure will become a law

The customary announcement has been issued from the Exchequer Bill office, relating to all bills dated in March, 1847, and undertaking to pay or issue new bills in exchange. The rate of interest on the new bills will be reduced to 2½d per diem. The old bills must be left at the Exchequer Bill office, on or before the 6th of March; and on the 16th of March the new bills will be issued.

There was a rather greater demand for money on Thursday, and prices were, consequently, slightly enhanced, until after the settlement in Consols. It is now, however, as abundant as before, and for this cause, and from the good firmness of the Funds, notwithstanding the depressing influence of the French disturbances, an increased Income tax, and rumoured changes in the Ministry

From the following condensed statement it will be seen that affairs in India wear anything but a promising aspect

In Calcutta, the following failures have to be added to the list previously reported: Owen Allanson and Co., H and A. Crooke, Alan Wiechell and Co., Syers Livingston and Co., and Lackerstoen, Brothers The only estates at present in the Insolvent Court are those of Colvocresl and Co., Hughesdon, Brothers, Colville, Gilmore, and Co., and Hodgkinson and Co

From Madras, we have accounts of the suspension of Messrs. Vinay, Cardosa, and Co., the correspondents of Messrs. Lauweus Phillips and Co Their estate is to be wound up under trustees. The shares of the Bank of Madras had fallen considerably, in consequence of the reduction of the rate of dividend to 5 per cent. per annum

The Foreign Market has been scarcely attended to during the week. Mexican has been firm, at 19½, but closes not quite so good. The other changes have been so slight, that the following list of closing prices will suffice to show the state of the market:- Brazilian Bonds, Small, 85; Grenada Bonds, Deferred, 3½; Mexican, 5 per Cent., 1845, 19; Ditto, Account, 19½; Spanish, Passive, 4½; Ditto, 3 per Cent., Account, 33½; Dutch, 2½ per Cent., 53½, Ditto, 4 per Cent., Certificates, 84¼

Shares continue flat, and the unsettled state of affairs do not induce purchasers. The following are the last prices:—Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Stour Valley, ½ dis.; East Anglia, £25, L. and E and L. and D., 10½; Eastern Counties, 10½; Ditto Extension, Five per Cent., No. 1, £6 12s. 4d., ; Ditto, ditto, No. 2, £6 13s. 4d., ; East Lincolnshire, 19½; Great Northern, 42½; North of England, 231 ex. div.; Great Western, 104; Ditto Quarter Shares, 20½; Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds, 8½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 78; Ditto Half Shares, 39; Ditto Great North of England Preference, 10½; York and North Midland, 74½; Ditto Preference, 15½; Ditto East and West Riding Extension, 3¼; Boulogne and Amiens, 13½; Dutch Rhenish, 1½; Northern of France, 11½; Ovest ern, 2 dis.

SATURDAY MORNING. The uncertainty existing with regard to the state of affairs in Paris, caused such considerable excitement at the opening of the Stock Exchange yesterday that business generally was checked. The Foreign, Colonial, and Railway Markets, but soon after receded to 88; from sales made by many who had previously been purchasers for the rise. Upon the news that a Ministerial combination with Paris by the railway had been cut off, prices receded to 87½; and a rumour of the abdication of Louis Philippe, caused for the moment a further decline. The closing prices of Consols were 87¼ for Money, and 87½ for the April Account. Upon the news of the abdication of Louis Philippe being confirmed, business was done at the various places of public resort, at a decline of ¼ per cent. upon the above prices. The Foreign Market was flat, and French Shares a little lower. Great Northern of French quote 10½; Boulogne and Amiens, 13½ 13¾; Central of France, 3¼; Orleans and Bordeaux, 4¼; Paris and Lyons, 4¾, Rouen and Havre, 16 16½.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

On Saturday last, the remains of the Most Rev. Dr. Howley were removed from the palace at Lambeth, and interred in the church at Addington, about three miles distant from the town of Croydon.

At the morning, soon after nine o'clock, a large crowd had assembled in the vicinity of Lambeth Palace, to witness the procession; but, it was not until nearly half-past ten o'clock that the head of the cortège issued through the principal gateway, flanked by the lofty red brick towers. The children of the [illegible] Schools, [illegible] the parish of Lambeth, were drawn up on each side of the outer wall of the churchyard. First in the procession came four mutes on horseback their horses saltirely caparisoned; next followed the beadles of the parish of Lambeth, the parish clerk, sexton, vestry clerk, and four churchwardens; then came fourteen clergymen of the parish of Lambeth, viz., the Rev. Messrs. Dallas, Cowie, rowne, Nugee, Bagley Lane, Dr. Vaughan, Chissold, Kemble, Eden, Jessey's State carriages; the carriage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge; the carriage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester; the carriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia; the late Archbishop's chariot; and the private carriages of J. Horsley Palmer, Esq., the Archbishop of York, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Bishop of London, the Right Hon. the Speaker, A. J. B. Hope, Esq., M.P.; Mess Burdett Coutts, &c.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—THE PROCESSION AT ADDINGTON.

t private houses was a manifestation of the high esteem in which the deceased Prelate had been held. At one or two of the more thickly populated places on the road, such as Brixton and Streatham, the procession resumed its funeral pace. It reached Croydon about one o'clock, where the inhabitants, closing their houses, came forth in great numbers to evince their sentiments of veneration for one who had always been to them a liberal patron. At Croydon, the cortège was joined by the Rev. Mr. Hodgson, vicar of that parish, the Rev. Mr. Harding, of Norwood, the Rev. Messrs Cole, Barr, and Ward, clergymen acting in that district, as well as by the churchwardens and other parochial authorities. From Croydon the funeral had still three miles to traverse, so that it was nearly two o'clock before it reached its destination.

Addington Park, or Addington Place, was the country residence of Archbishop Howley, and immediately adjoining the park is the hamlet of Addington, in whose humble church the remains were to be interred. Many of the inhabitants of Croydon, together with all the rustics of Addington, constituted no inconsiderable assemblage to receive the funeral procession, which, having entered at the opposite end of the park, and, having its numbers augmented by the domestics of the palace, moved slowly from the Addington-gate shortly before three o'clock; it soon reached the church, when, the coffin being removed into the interior, the service was read by the Archdeacon Harrison and Dr. Mill. The scene was, altogether, very impressive: the church was hung with black, and a large proportion of the people who attended from Croydon and the surrounding district were attired in mourning. The pall-bearers were the Honourable and Rev. Leslie Courtenay, private chaplain to the Queen, the Rev. Sir Charles Farnaby, Vicar of West Wycomb; the Rev. T. G. Hodgson, Rector of Croydon; the Rev. F. B. Wells, Rector of Woodchurch; the Very Rev. the Dean of Canterbury, the Hon. and Rev. Douglas Gordon, the Rev. W. Farrer, Rector of Addington; and the Rev. William Streatfield. On the ceremony being concluded, the crowd which had assembled outside the church, and who could not gain access till after the solemn service was over, were then freely admitted to view the coffin and the vault. In conformity with the desire of the deceased prelate, the remains of two of his children, buried in London, were on Friday last transferred, as were likewise the remains of a third from Fulham, to the vault at Addington.

Our Artist has sketched the sombre procession advancing up the hamlet to the church

Entering the Church by the West door, the spectator's attention is at once arrested by the admirable harmony and beauty of its design. The pillars, separating the nave from the aisles, carry well-moulded arches, which support the clerestory, the narrow windows in which are very deeply splayed. The capitals of the pillars are excellent and varied in design, and being deeply chiselled, produce a beautiful effect. The roof is of timber, of open work and stained dark oak, the principals having a neat pattern ornament painted on them. The chief feature in the Church is the chancel and semicircular apsis at the eastern end, the floor of which is, as usual, raised above the level of the Church. The ceiling of the apsis is domical in form, and in a narrow frieze running along at the spring of the ceiling, is this inscription, "A new commandment I give unto you." Three single light windows are in the apsis, and are filled with stained glass, of a neat arabesque pattern, on a pale green ground, and bordered with dark red and blue, and in their centres the monogram of Christ, with the Greek letters Alpha and Omega. The floor of the apsis is of red and black tiles, excepting in the centre, immediately in front of the Communion Table, where the tiles display a very beautiful ornament. They are of Minton's manufacture. The altar-rails are of wood, of massive form and good characteristic design. The reading desk is of wood, and is open. The pulpit, placed on the north side of the Church, is of stone, and is one of the very best we have seen. In design it is peculiarly chaste and effective, and we have, therefore, given a small Engraving of it in the initial letter to this description. The pulpit is raised on clustered columns, and is of square form, save that the south-west angle of the body of it is cut off, and a twisted column introduced to support the frieze, which is continued square in plan, to allow the cushion to be in its proper place. By this form of the pulpit, the clergyman, when addressing the congregation, looks rather to the south-west, but is not necessarily obliged to turn always to that direction. The capitals to the sustaining columns, and those of the pilasters on the different faces of the pulpit, are exceedingly happy in character. Within a sunken panel on the west face of the pulpit is a cross, floriated; and in similar panels at the sides are the Alpha and Omega, within a vesica piscis. The hand-rails to the pulpit stairs are of bold and simple character. The font, placed near the west door, is cup-shaped, and plain, excepting that a band runs round near the top, containing this text, "Suffer little children to come unto me;" and also Greek crosses at the four sides. The seats are open, and all free. A capacious gallery is at the west end, having on its front inscribed, "My house shall be called the house of prayer;" and at the north and south sides are narrow galleries, supported on iron cantilevers. These galleries are for the children belonging to the district, amounting to between 600 and 700. The Church, in the interior, is 117 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 40 feet high, to the pitch of gable.

As we before mentioned, the design does infinite credit to Messrs. Wyatt and Brandon, its architects; and great praise is due to Mr. Green, the Clerk of the Works, for the skilful way in which he has carried out the design. To Mr. Holland, of the late firm of Wyndard and Holland, as the builder, we must not withhold our testimony of approval.

The Rev. Joseph Brown, M.A., is the incumbent of the Church.

ST. MATTHIAS, BETHNAL-GREEN.

THE Church of St. Matthias, the ninth of the new district churches recently erected in Bethnal-Green, is situated in Hare street, Bethnal-lane, and was consecrated on Thursday. It is a very beautiful edifice, in the Lombardic style of architecture, and is worthy of the well-earned reputation of its highly talented architects, Messrs. Wyatt and Brandon. Externally it is built of brick, with stone dressings. The western front has the central portion rising above the aisles, and it is divided into two stories by a bold string-course. In the lower story are two narrow single-light windows, and a projecting porch having a deeply recessed doorway; and in the upper story is a handsomely decorated wheel window. The face of the central portion of the front is further ornamented by five sunken panels, with arched heads. The arches and caves are supported and enriched by an arched corbel moulding. The clerestory is lighted by windows of single days, arranged in triplets.

The tower stands on the south side of the Church, and is attached to the aisle. The tower, for two stories in height, is square in plan, and then takes an octagonal form, and is surmounted by a pinnacle carrying a highly ornamental vane. A side entrance to the Church is in the basement of the tower; and the next story has, on each face, recessed arches, with single-light windows in them. The lower story of the octagon is quite plain, with the exception of a boldly-formed arched corbel moulding round its upper part; but the second story has, on each face, recessed windows, of two days, within sunken panels, having arched corbel mouldings.

SEE OF CANTERBURY.—The Queen has ordered a congé d'elire to pass the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, empowering the Dean and Chapter of the metropolitan church of Canterbury to elect an Archbishop of that see, the same being void by the death of Doctor William Howley, late Archbishop thereof; and her Majesty has also been pleased to recommend to the said Dean and Chapter the Right Rev. Father in God Doctor John Bird Sumner, now Bishop of Chester, to be by them elected Archbishop of the said see of Canterbury.

THE present ostensible revenue of the Bishop of Chester is £1894—the annual value, £3250. The future ostensible revenue will be £4,500. The revenue of the late Archbishop of Canterbury was £36,000 per annum; but by the late Act of Parliament this will be reduced to £15,000 per annum; so that the Bishop of Chester's translation will be a leap from a comparatively small to a very handsome one, even after so immense a reduction.

STATE OF EDWARD VII.'S CHAPEL.—A Correspondent of the Builder says, that, unless some means are taken to stay the progress of decay in the exterior stonework of the structure, in twenty years it will be a ruin. Casting our eye upwards from the bases of several of the buttresses on the side nearest St. Margaret's Church, with a favourable light, it will be seen that the whole of the stonework, in three large compartments, is one mass of decay, the surface of it at least. The features of many of the images are completely effaced, and the fretwork of the windows is in a crumbling condition.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. MATTHIAS, BETHNAL-GREEN.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "FIORITA, ET LA REINE DES ELFRIDES," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The opening night at this theatre was marked by much novelty, and the result must have been as highly satisfactory to the Management as it was to the audience; for a house unusually full for this season of the year testified, by the warmest applause, their approbation of the new artists, and of the new ballet. The opera, which was Verdi's "Ernani," presented the débutants and débutanté, and, as in duty bound, it is of the lady we first speak. Signora Cruvelli more than confirms the favourable impression made at the rehearsals of the opera. Young, very graceful and pleasing in appearance, if not decidedly handsome, she is, in person and demeanour, well fitted to tread the stage with effect. She has evidently much feeling and enthusiasm, and her singing and acting give evidence of that feu sacré, without which science, accomplishment, and physical gifts, but flatter the ear, without awaking any corresponding feeling in the heart. To these great qualifications, Mdlle. Cruvelli adds a remarkably fine voice, powerful both in the upper and lower tones, of much flexibility, and very sweet when she does not, as is sometimes the case, over exert it. For this there is no occasion, and no excuse, for she has ample strength sufficient to fill—without any undue effort—even the large theatre at which she is now performing. Her execution of Elvira was excellent, and decidedly the best performance of this character we have seen in this country. The first air, "Ernani Involami"—by some considered to be one of the finest things Verdi ever wrote—shows off her voice and style of singing to the great advantage, and created great applause. In the concerted pieces which follow, the value of a voice so powerful as hers was strongly felt, and the concluding splendidly dramatic trio preceding Ernani's death, gave occasion for a fine display of tragic power on her part; and here her fine low notes came out with startling effect. To conclude, we must reckon her amongst the most important acquisitions made for some time past to the corps dramatique of her Majesty's Theatre.

The same may be said, with at least equal justice, of Signor Belletti, who appears to us one of the best baritones we ever heard. He is a finished artist, with an excellent method and taste, great dramatic feeling, and a capital voice. He is very peculiar, we had almost said, unprepossessing, in appearance, but carries this off by much dignity of deportment and gesture. He is quite at home in the part of Silva, but, of course, it is impossible to say whether in other characters he will be equally excellent: as far as he has gone, however, we have nothing but the greatest praise to award to him. It is not possible at present to judge with equal certainty of the new tenor, Cuzzani, who is suffering from the prevailing epidemic, which has, for the moment, weakened and obscured his voice. Thus far we can pronounce, that he is possessed of much real musical feeling, and that his singing is characterised by great finish. We listened to his execution of the opening tenor air with real pleasure, for, in an artistic point of view, he left nothing to be desired, while at the same time it was easy to see that indisposition had altered, and for the moment impaired, his natural voice. Before leaving the subject of the three débutants, we must observe the perfect ensemble of their acting, which, even had each artist individualy been less gifted, would have still produced an excellent effect. Gardoni appeared in a new character, that of Carlo, this part being usually entrusted to a baritone: the public, however, gained by the change, for there are few baritones, and few tenors also, who could have sang it with equal sweetness and charm, while he looked "every inch a King." The charming "Vieni meco" in the second act, was delightfully sung by this favourite tenor.

The opera, on the whole, is excellently mounted, and too great praise cannot be given to the orchestra, which, under the leadership of Mr. Balfe, and with the addition, as we hear, of several new and excellent performers, has attained an admirable precision and brilliancy, while the accompaniments are far more subdued than last season.

We will now give our readers some account of the new ballet, "Fiorita," the story of which appeared in our columns last week. The action is, indeed, very slight, greatly differing in this respect from the "Ballet Pantomime" of former years; a change, perhaps, few will regret, but still we almost wish there were greater scope given for the display of the remarkable pantomimic powers of Mr. Hall. It is, however, a charming ballet, and perfect in all its details. We have seldom seen the corps de ballet act so efficiently, and many of the groupings might serve as models for the sculptor. Our favourite of last year, Rosati, who sustains the principal part, is returned much improved we think; she executed several new pas, one of which, in the first tableau, is exceedingly graceful, and obtained an immediate encore: she advances to the front of the stage with a sort of demi-pirouette, on the point of her toe, alternately reversing from right to left, and ending with a bounding step à la Taglioni. She is looking well, and was most warmly received by the audience, both on Saturday and Tuesday nights. Marie Taglioni, who has also an important part to perform, that of the genius of evil, is likewise improved;—she has gained much additional strength, which last year was wanting to give full effect to her movements and attitudes, at all times so remarkable for their peculiar grace. She still belongs to the severe school of dancing; and though all are not equally admirers of this style, which is, however, undoubtedly the highest, yet all allow that Marie Taglioni is likely one day to become foremost in her art. We have already spoken of the corps de ballet, but we must mention in particular a "Danse Nationale" they execute, which is one of the prettiest of the kind we have ever seen. The effect is greatly heightened by the accompaniment of tambourines, on the part of the peasant girls, and of a sort of instrument nearly akin to the watchman's rattle, both in shape and sound, on the part of the men. This dance was much applauded. The scenery throughout is charming, especially the enchanted garden full of statues, and the last, where the back of the stage is nearly concealed by a fountain of real water, which produces an effect as beautiful as it is novel. Our Artist has engraved this exquisite scene. The costumes are good, and "Fiorita" will, we doubt not, rank with the most successful of its predecessors.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER III.—NEWGATE—PREPARING FOR AN EXECUTION.

WITHIN and around London lies a land chequered with lights and shadows, close city courts, and stifling suburban alleys, in which the sunshine only lingers for a few minutes during the day (where it seems imprisoned and in a hurry to escape above the dusky chimnies); and in this vast metropolis these scenes are contrasted with broad, green, airy parks, and long lines of palace-like streets, which stretch westward and dip into the open and surrounding country. Its living crowds are ever in motion—now to witness a Royal procession; then cleaving a November fog, or rolling eastward to gaze upon a "Lord Mayor's Show;" or, while darkness still reigns over the solemn-looking streets—from its blind alleys and secluded nooks—haunts of vice and infamy—the uneducated heirs to crime and wretchedness grope their way towards Newgate, to see the black and ominous stage erected, on which a real and living actor is about to die, to glut the gaze of those who are assembled to witness this legal tragedy. From the first hour after the deep-toned bell of St. Paul's had struck the death-knell of the departed Sabbath, the crowd began to congregate—only a few days ago—at the front of those forbidding barriers; the doors of the neighbouring coffee-houses and gin-shops were thrown open, and those who were not content to mingle with the mob below, and witness the horrible exhibition gratis, began to rush in, and bargain for their places. Then rang upon the ear the cries of "Comfortable room!" "Excellent situation!" "Beautiful prospect!" "Splendid view!" as each in turn recommended what may be termed the box-places at the windows, or the open and airy gallery on the roofs, for the pit lay dark and crowded below, and there the audience had free entrance. From every avenue this human crowd rushed in; up narrow courts, and the wide openings of the streets, they came in dusky groups, that passed through light and shadow as they crossed over where the glare of the gas-lamps fell—then merged into the dark mass of human forms on which the gloomy shadow of Newgate settled down.

All night long were the workmen busily employed in erecting the gloomy scaffold; the sound of their hammers and saws fell upon the ear at intervals; then again were drowned by the loud jests and coarse jests which were ever and anon uttered and responded to by many in that brutal mob. One after another the huge pieces of black wood were brought out and fitted together, until high above the crowd rose the grim stage on which the death-ending drama was to be represented. Even on the countenances of those who erected the pile no expression of pity could be traced; they hammered and sawed as if they were erecting a gay mansion for the living, instead of a place on which the doomed victim was a few moments to plant his feet—look around him—and die! The posts which supported the planks on which so many trembling actors had trod, were fitted into the same holes in the ground—foundations which had been dug long years ago, and stood firmly, with all their load of sorrow and crime, through scores of heart-aching execution—spots which the thoughtful man never passes without heaving a sigh, and where the brutal and the vicious only congregate to jest at degraded humanity.

Ranged along the line of the barriers, like hounds that are ever in training for the death, are seen those whom neither rain, snow, storm, nor darkness ever prevented from attending on a new sitter. Their conversation is about their companions of former years—of those who were long ago imprisoned, transported, or hanged; while they alone, though often within the clutches of the law, are still at large, with all their crimes. Some of these, whose hair and beard have whitened, remember the days when men were hung up in a row—can tell who died basely and who bravely: and on his memory who met death in sorrow and repentance they cast reproach and shame—while he who plunged daringly into the darkness of eternity, as if he gloried in his iniquity, they hold up as an example to be followed. No rocking nor swaying of the crowd from without can remove these old Idolaters of the Gallows: the mass of human bodies behind may roll to and fro, like the waves of the ocean, the motion affects them not—they are anchored like rocks at the foot of the gloomy headland, which stands with its dark beam reared high above the billowy multitude; nearly every countenance along those foremost ranks seems marked with the lines which witnessing such public executions has imprinted there—as if the very cottage had left its mark of impress upon their visages, and the dark beam its ominous line upon their furrowed brows—giving to them the very relief of the gallows itself, while watching its workings.

For in the expression of such countenances we can see that the exhibition they are awaiting has for them no terrors; that it is but calculated to harden their hearts, by making them more familiar with the image of death; and that, instead of repenting, they are more likely to go and take away life—thus following the example which the law itself has set before their eyes. Here and there, mingled among the crowd, are seen the figures of women; some, whose countenances are marked with dissipation, yet bearing faint traces of former beauty, as if Nature was still reluctant to obliterate the last image which she had first formed, though every trace of the pure spirit, which had once given it such light and animation, has long since perished. If they speak together in tones of pity, it is the hearty sympathy of maudlin sentiment; there is a rocking of the head, a swaying of the body, and a folding of the arms, which tell how low they have sunk; that the once delicate is prostrated before the power of ardent spirits; while the crushed bonnet, the dirty shawl, the gown fastened with a single hook upon the back, and that slip-shod slovenliness of the feet, proclaim that all the pride of the woman has vanished. Girls and youths, too, are there, on whose countenances the impress of innocence is still stamped, though the white purity of the flower is sullied with the trail of the slimy soil in which it has grown. Such girls and youths are frequently found on these stained and drooping flowers, that are growing amid such a wilderness of full-grown weeds—to reflect upon the deathly blight which must at last settle down and destroy them, unless they are transplanted by some kind and nurturing hand into a more favourable soil! Surely that law which can take away life might throw its protective power over such as these, and a score or two of policemen be stationed to prevent them from witnessing such a scene as an execution, which is only calculated to brutalise their youthful minds. Pocket picking, fighting, drunkenness, and profanity in almost every form, are the only examples to be picked up by these young fragments of the gallows. No man can visit there with a kind and feeling heart, unless impelled by such motives as would lead him to plunge into a pest-house in the hope of restoring again to health some of those whom the plague has stricken down.

Many a mechanic, who set out with his dinner in his basket, and his tools upon his back, on his way to his daily labour, is tempted, by those he there meets with, to stay beyond his allotted hour—until finding that it is too late to accomplish a full day's work, he returns to some neighbouring tap-room, and so the time is passed in recounting and listening to a long history of former executions, until night and drunkenness overtake him, at the very hour when the faithful wife, having prepared his evening meal, sits with pale anxiety quietly awaiting his return. Many an unfortunate man may date his ruin from the day he first witnessed an execution—as the first hour that threw him amid the group who haunt the foot of the gallows—and, as human nature is more prone to stoop to vice than to associate itself to virtue, so from that moment, he sank never more to rise again, as those feelings blunted, and he became himself lowering all who were once endeared to him to his own vicious standard. Such as he herds among have no pity for the dead—they pick out every sentence uttered by the witnesses in favour of the culprit who is about to suffer—they turn to ridicule the sorrow of the widow weeping children, and the once happy home which the dead he has done his deed left desolate. They argue that drink or anger, temptation or poverty, or a weariness of life drove him to the act, and that, saving the momentary pang which for ever ends his troubles, his last hours were soothed by kindness and attention, and that, for their part, they would sooner prefer such an ending than to be left to die amid disease, want, neglect, and wretchedness, with no human being near to breathe a word of hope and comfort. Time after time they have witnessed the worst—have seen the law armed and in full power—have seen life taken away—and turned aside without a feeling of terror. Life has been taken away before their very eyes—they have seen a fellow-creature hanged "to make an English holiday," and they have gone and again aroused the vengeance of "Justice," have destroyed life as they have seen it destroyed, have made that their own act and deed, which they have more formally—for lack of other merciful modes of punishment—again compelled to follow as an example—taking life for life, and visiting evil with evil—not in a spirit of hatred or revenge—but because custom has sanctioned the necessity.

Above the murmur and hum of that busy assembly, the lowing and bleating of cattle, as they were driven into the stalls and pens of Smithfield, fell with a strange and unnatural sound upon the ear, calling up for a few moments the tranquillity of green hill sides, and broad, level pasture-lands, where the fever, and the fret, and the crime from crowded cities can come. What a contrast to the scene that stretched below, the cold grey dawn of the raw morning, breaking upon the dark and weather-stained front of the prison, and giving to those iron-coloured and windowless walls an almost unearthly appearance. The very stones seemed to share the gloom into the face of the dead, as it from the hard granite had started out the grey and eyeless faces of all the children of crime who had suddenly crept from that gloomy scaffold into the grave. Carts rolled by, bearing the produce of quiet fields and tree-sheltered gardens to the market, the rustic driver turned his head for a moment; then, with eyes fixed upon the ground, went quietly along his way. The cloth moved slowly along, severing in its course the dense, close-packed crowd: the warm-clad passengers glanced down the wide thoroughfare, with its dark pavement of human heads—upon the black and ominous beam that projected spanning across, like a bridge of death—and ever would the same vision rise up before them all day long. They would see it in the arms of the trees which hung over the winding country-roads: it would fall like a blot upon the leaden-coloured sky, which bore a black and naked spray threw out its arm above the rounded horizon. In the rolling of their eyes they would hear the murmuring of the multitude; and the echo of the bridge over which they passed would send out from the mouths of its arch-spanning arches curses that would come floating deep and sing'ar as if from above the heads of that dumb, remorseless crowd.

Hush! the unceasing murmur of the mob now breaks into a loud deep roar—a sound as if the ocean had suddenly broken through some ancient boundary, against which its ever restless billows had for ages battled!—the wide dark sea of heads is all at once in motion—each wave seems living, as it rolls up the other, as they surge onwards towards this outlet. Every link in that great human chain is shaken; along the whole lengthened lines has the motion jarred, and each in turn sees, rolled up on the floor of the scaffold, like a serpent, the haltered rope! The hideous head that placed it there was only seen for a moment, as it lay, white and ghastly, upon the black boards, and then again was as suddenly withdrawn, as if ashamed of the deed it had done. The loud shout of the multitude once more subsided, or only fell upon the obstructed ear like the dreamy murmur of an ocean-shell. Then followed sounds more distinct and audible—in which ginger-beer, pies, and fruit, were vended under the names of notorious murderers, highwaymen, and criminals, famous in the annals of Newgate for the hardihood they had displayed in the hour of execution, when they terminated their career of crime at the gallows. The adding his way among these itinerant venders, was seen the meek-faced deliverer of tracts—the man of good intentions, now bonneted, now laughed at, the skirt of his seedy black coat torn across; yet, though pulled right and left, or sent headlong into the crowd by the swing of some brutal and muscular arm, never once from that pale face passed away its benign and patient expression, but ever the same form moved along in the fulfilment of his mission, in spite of all persecution. Another fight followed the scene which had already taken place; this time two women were the combatants; blinded with their long hair, they tore at each other like two Furies: their bonnets and cloaks were trodden under foot in the tumult, and they regarded beside the body of the poor dog, which, while searching for its master in the crowd, was, an hour before, kicked to death by the savage and brutal mob.

Another deep roar, louder than any which had preceded it, broke from the multitude—then came the cry of "Hats off!" and "Down in front!" as at a theatre. It was followed by the deep and solemn boom of the death-bell—the iron knell that rang upon the beating heart of the living man who was about to die; and, with blanched cheek and sinking heart, we turned away from the sickening scene.

FINE ARTS.

REVIVAL OF CHURCH BRASSES.

A BRASS, designed and executed by Mr. Wykeham Archer, and intended to be placed in the family chapel at Landwade, in Cambridgeshire, has attracted the notice of persons interested in and promoting the revival of ancient ecclesiastical art. This monument is one of a series which have been produced within the last ten years by the same artist.

The Landwade brass contains some original features, especially the introduction of a new species of colouring matter, to supply the desiderat.m of enamel, which substance cannot be applied to any material. This material having been tested by fire, and composed of the most durable agents, is calculated to last probably as long as enamel itself. An original mode of working in sharp relief, has likewise been effected, which is capable of producing either bold and effective results, or of being applied to the production of the most delicate tracery, foliages, &c.

The Chapel at Landwade was rebuilt by Walter Cotton, who died in 1445. It contains numerous tombs of the family from that period to the present time. It is contiguous to the ancient Manor House of Landwade, now in process of restoration by Alexander Beeton, Esq., by Mr. Beckett, architect.

It is proposed, in reviving the use of Church Brasses, to remedy the abuse which has, during three centuries, disfigured our churches by the unseemly introduction of mural monuments, whose prejudice tends, in many instances, to obstruct and even obliterate the architectural beauties of the edifice. In other cases, even the strength and security of the building have been impaired, by the practice of cutting away portions of columns for the introduction of memorial tablets.

The brass, on the contrary, requiring no projection, is inserted in the wall so as not in any way to interfere with the architectural economy of the church in which it is placed, but rather to enhance its general appearance by relieving those blank spaces of wall which, in the disuse of mural painting, have only a blank and dreary effect in the interior of churches. The brass, therefore, is a species of decoration in parts of a church where other species of ornamentation would be lost in the absence of sufficient light.

THE SEPULCHRE. Painted by MARSHALL CLAXTON. Drawn on Stone by BELL SMITH. Gambart and Co.

This is a production of novel treatment, and extraordinary power and breadth of effect. The composition consists of a semicircular opening into the "Sepulchre," which is laid the body of the crucified saviour upon a sheet, the head resting upon a stone elevation, to our thinking, somewhat too high, whilst the drawing of the neck appears defective in the line. The hands and feet are shown the prints of the nails, and there is the pierced side. At the feet lie the crown of thorns, the sponge, and the drawn nails. The background is dark and sombre, and with the white sheet in the foreground, gives a fine effect to the fine flesh-drawing. Descending from the upper left-hand crown of the semicircle are two angels: one is contemplating the placid features of the Saviour, whilst the other is wrapt in lamentation, and hides her face in her hands. The features of her companion evince intense grief. The figures are cleverly drawn, especially in the foreshortening: and the extended wings are well managed as to aerial effect: but they are somewhat too prominent for the limited size of the encumbrance. The figure in the spandrils of the arch, which are of a light stone tint, is inscribed, "HE WAS CRUCIFIED, DEAD, AND BURIED"—"THE THIRD DAY HE ROSE AGAIN FROM THE DEAD." The size of the main design is about 14 by 22 inches, so that when framed the drawing will have an important appearance. The design may be regarded by some persons to be rather severe in style; but, we consider it to be strongly recommended by sublime effect, and impressive art.
